RENEWED BULL MARKET AHEAD?

From October 1st to October 20th, the stock market lost over one-half of its total advance from April to September, 1926.

Since then, it has recovered about one-half the loss—a normal recovery. More stable conditions exist.

What Now?

Has liquidation been completed? Can we look for a renewed bull move, to run 20 to 30 points on the average, such as followed the selling movement of last March? Or, is the recent strength simply a technical recovery—to be followed by renewed liquidation?

The answer is given and specific recommendations made to aid in taking advantage of the markets ahead in our late bulletin, recently off the press. Copies are available for FREE distribution. Simply ask for NTN-14.

Place Your Money Profitably

FOR 24 years The Financial World has made it a basic editorial policy to dig into values as the bed rock principle to secure profit from stock purchases. That is banking policy applied to investments.

The proof of how this policy operates is shown from the result of The Financial World's recommendations in the last two and a half years.

Out of 218 dividend-paying stocks it had selected, 196 have advanced in value, whereas only 22 show declines. A purchase of 10 shares of each would today show a net enhancement in value to the investor of $35,642, including the loss sustained from the 22 securities that declined, and without crediting the dividends which provided a return of more than 7%.

That is the story of why investors who follow values invest their dollars profitably.

This is the conservative type of advice The Financial World constantly strives to provide its subscribers.

REACTION DEVELOPS IN COTTON MARKET

Appearance of More Supply Sends Quotations 15 to 19 Cents Lower on the Day.

FIRMNESS AT LIVERPOOL

Situation Abroad Starts Selling—Hedging and Swapping Swell Volume of Sales.

The improvement of about $2 a bale from low prices of the week brought out more cotton yesterday and a setback during the short session left final quotations 15 to 19 points lower on the day. Hedging operations developed at the opening with Southern wire selling orders a feature of later trading, while spot houses sold on the close. Owing to increased hedging and swapping business between months, more cotton changed hands than for some time.

Liverpool opened up 10 English points and closed around highest quotations of the day. This steadiness abroad started the local market within a few points of previous closing levels, and several liberal overnight selling orders were executed within range of two or three points. The advance above 13 cents for the May position attracted cotton from commission houses as well as spot quarters, active covering during Friday's sharp upturn having reduced the demand. Pressure on both New York and New Orleans followed the Census Bureau report on domestic consumption for October. The figures, in showing mills used less cotton than during September and only 24,000 bales more than last year, proved less than had been generally anticipated.

Around 12½ cents for December, enough cotton was wanted to offer resistance. The covering of December hedges made further progress, which narrowed the spread between December and March to less than 30 points and that between December and October to about 90 points. When October went on the board Nov. 1, initial trading occurred at 115 points over December and differences have narrowed one-quarter of a cent during the interval. In addition to purchases of December and sales of distant months, various holders of December liquidated long contracts and purchased October.

At a decline of 10 to 19 points, sales of spot cotton in Southern markets aggregated 60,000 bales yesterday. Middling was quoted at Dallas at 11.55 and at 12.25 at Augusta.

The following shows the statistical position of cotton figured to yesterday by the Financial Chronicle:

BELGIAN COAL OUTPUT UP.

But Export Is So Large That Home Consumers Protest.

A report of the Belgian coal industry published in the Frankfürter Zeitung states that "the Belgian coal mines produced in September (twenty-s[illegible] working days, against twenty-five in August) the record quantity of 2,174,250 tons, which compares with 2,117,540 tons in August. Stocks declined from 178,000 to 134,000 tons. The number of miners increased from 156,405 to 159,?57. The coke output declined from 455,960 to 423,500 tons, owing to a great extent to insufficient deliveries of suitable German coal.

"The market is still under the influence of the British coal miners' strike, and prices show a rising tendency. As a result of the protests of the Belgian coal consumers, the Belgian Government two months ago limited the export of Belgian coal to 250,000 tons per month. However, this quantity is considered by the coal exporters as insufficient, as the total prewar output was smaller than at present, and yet the exports averaged 600,000 tons per month. It is now intended to limit the exports of coal according to countries."

SOUTH AMERICAN EXPANSION

A. M. Pope Says Economic Problems Overshadow All Others.

A. M. Pope, Vice President of the First National Corporation of Boston, who has just returned from a three months' tour in South America, said yesterday that economic events are playing a major part in South American affairs, overshadowing political and social problems. Much economic and industrial expansion is contemplated, he said, as an outgrowth of the recently developed national and economic consciousness among the South American republics. American financial aid, he added, will be necessary for this development.

Mr. Pope said road building would be a most important feature of this new movement. The roads in many sections of South America, he indicated, are unsuitable for automobile traffic.

OCTOBER CONSUMPTION OF COTTON VERY LARGE

WASHINGTON, Nov. 13 (AP).—Cotton consumed during October totaled 568,532 bales of lint and 75,539 of linters, compared with 571,105 bales of lint and 74,352 of linters in September this year and 543,679 of lint and 75,750 of linters in October last year, the Census Bureau announced today.

Cotton on hand Oct. 31 was held as follows: In consuming establishments 1,215,83 bales of lint and 99,318 bales of linters, compared with 937,129 of lint and 100,058 of linters on Sept. 30 this year and 1,216,437 of lint and 82,606 of linters on Oct. 31 last year. In public storage and at compresses 3,469,809 bales of lint and 42,868 of linters, compared with 3,293,217 of lint and 38,488 of linters on Sept. 30 this year and 4,489,382 of lint and 23,694 of linters on Oct. 31 last year.

Imports during October totaled 30,449 bales, compared with 10,007 in September this year and 12,402 in October last year.

Exports during October totaled 1,369,820 bales, including 10,948 bales of linters, compared with 794,584, including 5,149 of linters, in September this year and 1,421,482, including 7,466 of linters, in October last year.

Cotton spindles active during October numbered 32,592,808, compared with 32,134,682 in September this year and 32,425,206 in October last year.

Stocks of cotton in bales, exclusive of linters, compare as follows, with a month ago and a year ago:

	Oct. 31, '26.	Sep. 30, '26.	Oct. 31, '25.
In mfg. establishments	1,215,878	937,129	1,216,437

November	543,008	495,162	532,702	579,190

Home consumption last March surpassed all monthly records since 1914, and probably all previous records. Until that month the largest monthly consumption was 621,264 bales in March, 1923; the smallest since 1914 was 295,292, in December, 1920.

Exports in October compare as follows, in running bales:

October	1,369,820	1,421,482	946,506	774,320

Novemb'r	1,206,786	1,306,550	767,289	858,337

The export of cotton in October, 1925, was the largest since February, 1915, when 1,501,701 bales were exported.

In the three completed months of the cotton year consumption by the home mills has been 1,640,289 bales, against 1,477,997 bales in the same period last year. Exports during the three months have been 2,555,733 bales, against 2,489,631 in 1925.

BIG DIVIDEND DISTRIBUTION.

One of Largest Totals on Record to Be Paid Out Tomorrow.

Mid-month dividend payments will be made tomorrow by 164 companies in what is probably one of the largest Nov. 15 distributions on record. The total is swelled by an unusual number of extra dividends.

The largest single distribution to be made tomorrow is that of the Northwestern Trust Company of Philadelphia which is paying $9 a share on its $50 par stock. The smallest dividend on the list is that of the Jade Oil Company, ½ cent a share on stock of a par value of $1. As a rule the dividends are small, many distributions being noted of from 5 to 10 cents per share on stocks of par value low enough to be available to the small investor.

Among the important companies paying dividends tomorrow are Allis-Chalmers, American Can, American Water Works and Electric, Burns Brothers, Jersey Central, Columbia Gas and Electric, paying four separate dividends; Firestone Tire, Continental Can, Havana Electric and Utilities, National Biscuit, Shell Union Oil, A. O. Smith Corporation, Southern California Edison, Stewart Warner Speedometer, Tide Water Oil, United Gas and Improvement, United States Rubber, Vanadium and Wilson & Co.

Spring and Bumper Earnings.

The C. G. Spring and Bumper Company reports a net profit for the twelve months ended on Aug. 31 last of $547,719 after expenses, taxes and depreciation, as compared with $460,934 in the preceding year. In the year the company issued 15,000 shares of no-par common stock and 5,000 shares of preferred for cash and property. Gross earnings for the period were $789,224, as against $723,946 in the preceding twelve months.

Sun Oil's Stock Dividend.

The Sun Oil Company has declared a stock dividend of 6 per cent. in addition to the regular quarterly cash dividend of 25 cents. Both are payable on Dec. 15 to stock of record of Nov. 26. The company paid a stock dividend of 3 per cent. last December.

LIQUIDATION SENDS WHEAT STILL LOWER

At New Low on the Present Movement and May 7 Cents Under Monday's High.

EXPORTS 500,000 BUSHELS

Selling Is for the East—Short Covering Gives Corn a Fraction of a Cent Rise.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, Nov. 13.—Liquidation was on in the grain markets again with wheat declining two cents from the finish of yesterday to a new low on the present movement and showed seven cents under the high on Monday on the May. While there was short covering and buying against daily and weekly bids, the finish was about the bottom, with net losses of 1⅝ cents. Houses with Eastern connections were again the leading sellers of wheat.

There is little in the general run of the news that attracted attention, either from Argentina or abroad.

The main support today came from profit taking by shorts and a little buying for a rally, because of the declines the last few days into new ground. All the markets are feeling the effect of the absence of large speculative interests; the Eastern group of traders who have been active in the market and a sustaining factor of late appear to have been liquidating the last few days.

Export sales at the seaboard were 500,000 bushels and traders here are inclined to look for a better business in United States wheats. But Manitoba wheats are relatively lower than Chicago.

There were sales of 222,000 bushels of red Winter here to interior millers, the price in store being 1¾ cents under December.

Argentine news was mixed. Cromwell, the Lamson expert, cabled that there was serious damage, yet the northern section has an average crop of good quality.

Primary arrivals today were 1,361,000 bushels; week ago, 1,232,000; last year, 1,200,000. Shipments were 770,000 bushels; week ago, 1,130,000; last year, 1,433,000.

All deliveries of corn sold at a new low on the crop, but there was sufficient short covering to bring about a rally, and the finish was unchanged to ¼ cent higher. Prices have been on the downgrade for about three weeks. Elevator people have bought December and sold May in turning over their hedges at 9 cents spread, a most unusual figure.

The big run of old corn appears to be over; the primary receipts of 6,619,000 bushels for the week decreased 4,545,000 bushels from the previous week, but were 3,755,000 bushels more than last year. There is said to be 4,000,000 bushels of corn on track in various positions here with 2,967 cars of all grains awaiting disposition, 2,033 of which cars are at elevators. This is the smallest supply on track in more than a week. The Corn Products Company is now buying new corn, although receipts as yet are small.

Elevator interests are buying December and selling May oats at 4⅜ to 4½ cents spread. Local professionals bought rye and sold wheat, and Germany was in the market for small lots of rye at the seaboard.

Primary arrivals of corn today were 1,010,000 bushels; week ago, 1,486,000; last year, 551,000, and shipments, 786,000 bushels; week ago, 712,000; last year, 317,000.

WHEAT OFF 2c A BUSHEL.

Local Market Lacks Support as Prices of Futures Decline.

Wheat prices on the New York Produce Exchange dropped about 2 cents a bushel in active trading yesterday. Contributing to pressure were weakness in cables, continued limited foreign demand, liquidation and Argentine conditions. There appeared to be a growing feeling that Southern hemisphere crops will result in a somewhat larger world supply this year than last.

Hedging pressure was light and there was an absence of export support. Receipts were liberal and Canadian weather and marketings were good. The break carried prices 10 to 12 cents below the best prices in New York this season and there appeared to be pressure on the decline. Week-end realization failed to provide rallies. Export business totaled 500,000 bushels, chiefly Manitobas.

EUROPEAN AGRICULTURE CLOSE TO PRE-WAR BASIS

The bulletin of the Agricultural Department states that "agricultural production in Europe outside of Russia has approximately recovered from the effects of the war. In some lines production has recovered and increased, while in others it remains somewhat short of what it was before the war. In 1925 the production of the principal food crops, wheat, rye, and potatoes, was greater than the pre-war, 1909-1913, average. This year the wheat and rye crops are not so large, but the potato crop and the feed crops—barley, oats, and corn—are larger than the average before the war.

"Production in any given year, however, is not so good an indication of recovery as the area planted. The area planted to principal crops in all European countries exclusive of Russia is still about 5 per cent. below the pre-war average. The area of a few crops, notably corn, barley, sugar beets, and tobacco, is greater than before the war, with potatoes about the same as in 1909-13. It seems, therefore, that while the average production of some crops would not be equal to the pre-war average, the value of the several commodities added together (on some stable base) possibly would be approximately equivalent to the pre-war average."

DECLINES IN CRUDE RUBBER

Most Trading Done in March Position in Local Exchange.

Declines ranging from 10 to 20 points in the price of crude rubber futures were spread over the six positions traded in on the Rubber Exchange of New York yesterday. The day's turnover involved ninety-eight contracts, most of it in the March position. February, November and December were only moderately active at losses of 20 points each, while January and May were off 10 points.

The London market was dull, with prices unchanged to ⅛d down.

Range of prices for the deliveries traded in on the local Exchange follow:

CRUDE OIL OUTPUT IN 1926.

Crude oil production in domestic fields of the United States from Jan. 1 to Nov. 13 was 647,245,000 barrels, as compared with 659,910,000 barrels in the like period of last year, The Oil, Paint and Drug Reporter announces. The price of gasoline at service stations in the United States on Nov. 12 averaged 22.27 cents a gallon, as against 19.97 cents a gallon a year ago.

From May to November, the publication states, the price of shellac at Calcutta, India, was more than doubled, and this was followed by a sharp advance in the prices of associated products. These price advances are due to underproduction in Winter crops, reduction of reserves in Calcutta and entry of speculators into the primary market.

COMMODITY PRICES.

Cash Grains Continue Lower—Lard at New Low—Cotton and Rubber Weak.

Sharp price declines continued to be scored in the cash grains yesterday as an aftermath of the reaction in the contract options. Wheat, rye and oats all lost ground.

Yesterday's closing wholesale prices for commodities, in the New York market, unless otherwise noted, were:

MUSSOLINI ON WHEAT CROP.

Urges Larger Production Per Acre Through "Rural Mobilization."

The report of the speech made by Mussolini at the Costanzi Theatre in Rome while distributing to agriculturists prizes for the best results in the present year's wheat campaign, quotes the Prime Minister as saying that in the present season 60,000,000 quintals of wheat had been produced on 4,915,000 hectares of land, whereas, with the adverse atmospheric conditions prevailing this year, in normal times the production would not have exceeded forty-two to forty-eight million quintals.

The land cultivated with wheat should not be increased, unless by land newly drained and fertilized, but should remain under 5,000,000 hectares. On the contrary, the average crop per unit should be increased to 15 quintals per hectare, resulting in a total crop of 75,000,000 quintals. Signor Mussolini asked for the mobilization of all the rural forces in Italy in order to get another quintal of wheat per hectare next year.

Weston Electrical Instrument.

The Weston Electrical Instrument Corporation reports for the nine months ended on Sept. 30 net income of $537,802 after depreciation, Federal taxes, &c., which is equal, under the participating provisions of the shares, to $2.60 a share earned on 100,000 no-par shares of Class A stock and $1.85 a share earned on 150,000 shares of no-par common. For the September quarter the profit was $132,301, or 68 cents a share, on Class A, and 43 cents a share on common, as compared with $190,142, or 91 cents, a share on Class A, and 66 cents a share on common in the preceding quarter.

Railway Equipment Orders.

The Standard Tank Car Company is building for its subsidiary, the Standard Transit Company, 500 tank cars for lease to the Gulf Refining Company, Railway Age reports. The American Car and Foundry Company has booked twelve passenger coaches for the Manila Railroad. The Denver & Rio Grande Western contemplates buying about ten freight locomotives and the Missouri Pacific is expected to enter the market for forty-five engines of various types.

BIG MERGER OF BANKS AUTHORIZED BY STATE

American Exchange-Pacific Also Permitted to Operate Six Branches in City.

In connection with the projected merger of the Irving Bank and Trust Company and the American Exchange-Pacific National Bank, the State Department of Banking in Albany has issued a certificate of authorization for the American Exchange-Pacific Bank, marking the conversion of the national institution into a State bank for the purpose of consolidation. The capital of the new bank will be $7,500,000.

The department also has granted the American Exchange-Pacific Bank the right under a special authorization to exercise certain fiduciary powers. In addition it has given approval for the new institution to open branch offices at Forty-second Street and Park Avenue, Broadway and Grand Street, Twenty-eighth Street and Madison Avenue, Forty-ninth Street and Seventh Avenue, Fifty-ninth Street and Park Avenue, and Hudson and North Moore Streets.

The Williamsburgh Savings Bank has been authorized to open a branch at Flatbush and Atlantic Avenues, Brooklyn. This authorization was in the face of a vigorous protest by ten other banks in Brooklyn, whose executives contend that the Williamsburgh institution is "invading their territory." Counsel for these institutions are considering plans for legal action to set aside the Banking Department's authorization.

An organization certificate for the Long Island State Bank and Trust Company of Riverhead, L. I., has been issued in connection with the conversion of the Long Island State Bank. The Bell Investment Company, Inc., has been permitted to increase its capital stock from $400,000 to $600,000.

Transfer Agent for Stocks.

The Guaranty Trust Company has been appointed transfer agent for common stock of the South American Oilfields, Inc., and for the $6 cumulative preferred stock and common stock of the New Jersey Power and Light Company.

LATEST DEALINGS IN THE REAL ESTATE FIELD

BUILDERS ACQUIRE PARCELS IN QUEENS

Vacant Property in Long Island City Section Is Bought for Improvement.

HOMESEEKERS IN DEAL

Nassau, Westchester and New Jersey Dwellings Are Purchased for Occupancy.

Real estate activity in Queens County yesterday centred around the sales of Long Island City parcels. This section of Queens has been unusually active during the past three weeks, the majority of buyers having shown a preference for vacant plots for business and apartment house improvements.

In the Elmhurst section, Jane Crough sold the triangular plot fronting on Queens Boulevard, Railroad Avenue and Kneeland Street through John Greer and William C. Ritter, as brokers. The same brokers also sold a lot 25 by 100 feet on the east side of Crescent Street for Helen Bennett to James Fusco. They also sold a lot 25 by 100 feet on Second Avenue, south of Pierce Avenue, for the Zollikofer estate to a builder.

In the Thomson Hill section, Irving Berger, President of the Laurel Hill Estates, Inc., sold the northwest corner of Anable Avenue and Packard Street, a plot 100 by 100 feet, in Thomson Hill, L. I. This corner will shortly be improved with five buildings containing six apartments and stores. This is one of the few remaining corners in that vicinity that is now being improved with apartment houses. The owners were Diamond & Peskin. The property was sold to operators.

The same firm also sold the business plot, 80 by 100 feet, on the north side of Nelson Avenue between Caroline and Bliss Streets, to a Brookline builder for improvement with stores and apartments. The Laurel Hill Estates also sold the northwest corner of Eighth Street and Stryker Avenue, Woodside to a builder for improvement with a four-story apartment house with stores.

The Hub Realty Company, sold for William A. Gerbe, the vacant residential property, 50 by 100 feet, on the west side of Twentieth Street, 275 feet south of Jackson Avenue to a local investor.

LAGOONS FOR SHORE DRIVE.

Brooklyn Chamber Studies Project to Build Yacht Anchorages.

The Brooklyn Chamber of Commerce, through its Parks and Playground Committee, of which Nathaniel H. Levi is President, is making a study of the waterfront along Shore Drive, Brooklyn, to see if it would be feasible to construct lagoons for yacht anchorage on the inner side of the driveway. The matter will be taken up at the next meeting, when a report will be made on the latest plan of the city in regard to the Shore Drive.

The Parks and Playground Committee feels that it will be desirable to put into use during the Winter season as well as the Summer, grounds connected with the public schools, particularly in the congested sections. The question of coordinating supervision of playgrounds on school property and playgrounds on park property was discussed. A report is to be made at the next meeting on the result of investigation through the City Recreation Committee and other authorities regarding the obstacles to this coordination.

PRAISES IMPROVEMENT IN CENTRAL PARK

Dr. Kunz Urges Use of Money Spent in European Tours to Beautify the Spot.

If New York residents would take pride in Central Park and spend some of the money on it that they spend in traveling to Europe each year the city would have a most beautiful spot, according to Dr. George F. Kunz, Honorary President of the Bird and Tree Club, who spoke at the third annual luncheon of the organization at the Hotel Roosevelt yesterday. Dr. Kunz said that praise is due the park officials for their work in the last year in planting new trees and making efforts to save those that are diseased.

Dr. C. Stuart Gager, Director of the Brooklyn Botanic Garden, told of the efforts being made to produce substitutes for Christmas greens, so that the forests would no longer be stripped of the tender young trees that are shipped to the city in such quantities at the holiday season. Dr. Frank Chapman told of the work among the birds and pointed out the mistake in trying to acclimate birds to a strange environment.

The tables were decorated in an unusual way and prizes were offered for the best exhibit. The first prize was won by the Conservation Committee of the Garden Club, which had as centrepiece a jade tree made entirely of gumdrops. The second prize went to a group belonging to the Bird and Tree Club.

Other speakers were Dr. G. Clyde Fisher, Curator of the American Museum of Natural History; Mrs. Thomas A. Edison and Mrs. James R. McKee, Vice Presidents of the Bird and Tree Club; Mrs. John Clapperton Kerr, President of the Woman's League for the Protection of Riverside Park; Mrs. John W. Paris, President of the New York State Federation of Garden Clubs; Mrs. Benjamin Prince, Past President of the Sorosis Club; Mrs. Frederic M. Burton, President of the Galveston Civic League; Major Barrington Moore and Dr. Robert F. Morris.

TALL APARTMENT FOR NARROW LOT

Benjamin Mordecai Buys an East Side Garage Site for a Fifteen-Story Structure.

SALE ON WEST 42D STREET.

Farmers Loan and Trust Company Transfers Five-Story Building to an Investor.

A fifteen-story apartment house on a twenty-five foot lot is to be erected in the upper east side section by Benjamin Mordecai, operator and builder.

There are several tall apartments erected on twenty-five foot lots on the west side, notably those built by Edward W. Browning in the Seventies a few years ago, but only one or two east of Fifth Avenue.

As a site for his building Mr. Mordecai has purchased from the Far Hills Land Corporation, represented by the Schley estate, K. B. Schley, President, the garage at 108 East Sixty-sixth Street, occupying a plot 25 x 100 feet.

Plans for the proposed structure are now being drawn by Thomas T. Nast, architect, and it is expected that it will be ready for occupancy for the 1927 renting season. According to Pease & Elliman who negotiated the sale of the property the new building will be of the highest class non-housekeeping type with large and small suites.

Farmers Loan in 42d St. Deal.

Farmers Loan and Trust Company, as trustee, has sold the five-story store building at 436 West Forty-second Street to an investing client of James G. Trainer, who is a broker in the transaction.

Thomas M. Bevans has purchased the northeast corner of Bedford and Barrow Streets consisting of 56 Barrow Street and 82-84-86 Bedford Street. The plot is 68 x 74 feet and consists of six houses. Carl Gunther was the broker.

Wood, Dolson Co., Inc., sold for the Esam Holding Corporation, 262 West Eighty-third Street, a six-story elevator apartment house on a plot 60 x 100 feet. This property is located between Broadway and West End Avenue and is the key to both corners.

REAL ESTATE NOTES.

$120,000 Loan Placed on Carmine Street Apartment.

Peppe & Brother have placed for the Vinsam Building Corporation, owners of the six-story apartment with stores at 59-61 Carmine Street, running through to 48-50 Leroy Street (now Seventh Avenue), a first mortgage of $120,000 at 5½ per cent for five years with the Union Square Savings Bank.

Seaman & Pendergast have leased an apartment in 212 East Forty-eighth Street for the Ogden Goelet Estate to Paul K. Fisher, in 26 East Ninth Street with Gaines, Van Nostrand & Morrison to Mrs. Howard Walton, and in 206 East Sixty-first Street with Ruland & Benjamin to Mrs. Herbert Groesbeck.

A lease of the new Forty-eighth Street hotel, west of Broadway, was negotiated for a syndicate of hotel men, clients of Michaelson & Bernknopf. Max Brav and Feinberg, Lurie & Weinberg were the brokers.

TREES FOR MT. MORRIS PARK

Neighborhood Association Hopes to Replant Historic Knoll.

At 8 o'clock tomorrow evening the Neighborhood Association of Mount Morris Park will hold a meeting in the Public Library at 124th Street, opposite Mount Morris Park, for open discussion of Mount Morris Park conditions. Mrs. C. E. Church is President of the association.

The success of a former meeting in June when conditions were said to be deplorable leads the organization to believe, Mrs. Church said yesterday, that further meetings will be to the advantage of the entire neighborhood.

Since the June meeting the Park Department planted and maintained all Summer two flower beds.

The Harlem Chamber of Commerce replaced the flagpole on the old fort in the park, and at the coming meeting it is hoped that enough memorial trees will be pledged to replant this historic knoll.

The Merchant's Point of View

A TOUCH of wintry weather during the past week was very gratifying to those in the apparel trades. It served as a reminder of more cold days to come in due course and sent both men and women to the shops to renew or replenish wardrobes in preparation for the Winter which, according to the calendar, is due to begin in a little over five weeks. The cool spell extended over so large a territory, furthermore, as to infinence a very large volume of consumer buying. Suits, overcoats, underwear and gloves were among the articles most in demand by men customers. Buying by the other sex inelnded inner and outer garments, gloves, fur pieces and the like. Comfortables and other household articles were also in greater request. Retailers started to put in further orders with garment manufacturers to meet the demand which has set in, and out-of-town buyers became a little more insistent on speedy deliveries of needed goods. In the primary markets there is something of the inll usual at this period of the year because of inventory preparations, although there continues a fairly steady stream of goods, in small individual lots, through distributing channels. Showings are being made of merchandise for the Winter resort and early Spring seasons, the buying of which will be in full blast very soon. Holiday goods are strongly in evidence in many of the shops which are trying to hasten purchases of them early. For this week the merchandising event of most note is the final clearance sale of the stock of Claflins Incorporated, which begins tomorrow, and which will mark the closing chapter of this big jobbing house.

Superseding Old Economic Laws?

Will the rising generation be obliged to learn a new set of economic laws and see the old time-honored ones go into the discard? This is not quite as foolish a question as it may appear at first sight. That "competition is the life of trade" was one of the axioms of the old order of things. No one thought of disputing it, even when its consequences were somewhat deplorable because of the ruthlessness of the methods resorted to. It was even imbedded in the law as was the now discredited "caveat emptor"—let the buyer beware. But, in recent years, a new order of things has arisen. Too much competition, it was found, resulted in cheapening goods at the expense of quality and serviceableness and so made them really dearer. This was only one phase of the matter. Unscrupulous traders took advantage of the policy of unrestricted competition to crush rivals either just starting in business or lacking the resources for a continuing struggle. In the end, what was supposed to make for a fair field and no favor resulted in aiding monopolistic control. A new phrase was coined to meet the altered conditions and much was heard of "unfair competition." Then the legislators took a hand in the matter and enacted laws to curb the unscrupulous, besides setting up the Federal Trade Commission to see to the enforcement of those laws. This legislation was followed up by similar enactments in many of the States. Since then, more has been heard of cooperation between concerns in various lines than of mere competition. They are exchanging information and data so as to put each on an even footing with the others, in the confident belief that what aids an industry as a whole cannot but be of help to all the members of it.

Restricting Supply to the Demand.

Then there is the old familiar "supply and demand" rule for regulating prices. Under it, values of articles fluctuated, at times wildly, from season to season or from year to year. This was especially the case with things that were of annual growth, like the farm products, the prices of which are fixed in the world markets. As to some of these—like rubber, cotton, silk and sisal—a single country in each instance has the preponderance of the supply, and the growers collectively or the Government itself can establish the price. In other cases, notably so as concerns the principal grains, there is no such preponderance, and the world's supplies come from various sources which are independent of one another. As regards the grains, furthermore, there is an element of chance which makes futile any attempt at restricting in advance the supply to the likely demand. This is the case also with regard to cotton. Vagaries of weather and amount of insect infestation are main factors in the uncertainty. It is conceded that it would be for the best interests of all concerned if prices of the commodities mentioned, and others as well, were kept uniform at levels that would be profitable to the growers without being oppressive to those making use of them. Attempts at accomplishing this result have been in progress concerning rubber, sisal and raw silk, and now in a somewhat similar thing is being tried as to cotton. In each of the instances, however, a single country is involved. Emboldened by the efforts, an extension of the scheme is in contemplation as regards sugar. It is proposed to have a general understanding with the producers of this article in different countries to restrict the output each year to the probable demand, and a conference with this end in view is announced to take place in London in the near future. Should the movement succeed, who knows but what the next step will be its extension to other fields, resulting in the arbitrary fixing of prices of many essential commodities by the method of adjusting supply to demand? That would dispose of another economic maxim.

Price Maintenance Still Agitated.

There are plenty of evidences that the agitation for price maintenance has by no means spent its force and that the proponents of it will continne to urge legislation to sanction the practice. The Capper-Kelly bill is still before Congress and a number of influential interests will try to procure its passage at the coming session. Ths chances are against this, however, because the session is a short one, and what with the Appropriation hills and other urgent measures, there will be plenty of more important subjects to take up the time of the legislators. Still, a request has been made to the House Interstate Committee for further hearings on the Capper-Kelly hill. During the last session of Congress a number of hearings were held, the upshot being a decision by the committee against reporting the hill favorably. It is difficult to see how any new arguments can now be presented, both sides having hitherto presented their respective views in great detail. The attorney for an organization favoring price maintenance undertook to justify its position in an address a few days ago before the New York Patent Law Association. His argument was ons by analogy. He said it was unlawful to sell postage stamps at reduced prices or to indulge in price cutting on railway tickets or to split premiums on life insurance policies. Makers of trade-marked goods, he urged, only asked the same kind of protection. But the element of pnblic policy is not the same in the lattsr instance. And it should be borne in mind that those who make trade-marked goods are not wholly remediless. If they will deal directly with retailers they may refuse to sell to any of those who indulge in price cutting. This may be somewbat harder than it is to work througb jobbers, but it can be done.

European Iron and Steel Combination.

An invitation has been extended to British Iron and steel mannfacturers to join the international syndicate recently formed by French, German, Belgian and Luxemburg interests. A dispatch to the Department of Commerce, received during the past week, declared that the invitation would probably be accepted, and would be followed by an adhesion to the syndicate by Czechoslovakian and other European interests. The purpose back of the whole movement is to stifle competition and to parcel out production among the nations entering into the compact. It will be no easy task to get British iron and steel men to surrender their individnality and merge their interests with those of Continental producers. They do not work as a trust or cartel as do tbe latter and their policies are not dictated by a few persons. In a restricted field, that of chemicals and dyes, the British manufactnrers have entered into a working agreement with those of Germany, but in that case there was a virtual unity of producers who were very few in number. Britisb and Continental producers of iron and steel have only one point in common. This is that a large proportion of their output is for export. Bnt all of them together have a small production as compared with that of this country which turns out about one-half of all made in the world. This large production, however, is not taken into account by the European manufacturers because the greater portion is nsed in this country, a circumstance that makes the foreign combination of small consequence here.

Prices of Cotton and Cotton Goods.

As was anticipated, the latest Government estimate of the cotton crop placed it at nearly 18,000,000 bales. From the course of quotations since the issuance of this estimate on Monday last, it would appear as though the thing had been pretty well discounted in advance because of the narrow range in the price fluctuations which immediately followed. Reports of frost then sent up prices sharply. There seem to be interests strong enough to prevent any material lowering, since buying is increased whenever there is any drop in price. An impression prevails abroad as well as bere that cotton is about as low as it is likely to be for a long period to come and that it is the part of wisdom to stock up on it now. Increased exports are one sign of thie. Foreign spinners are confident that there will be a larger market for their wares at the reduced prices which the lower cost of the raw material makes possible. Pretty much the same thing is the case with cotton manufacturers of this country. With confidence that prices of raw cotton are very nearly stabilized at the present levels, the makers of cotton textiles are gradnally lowering the prices of their goods to correspond. Gray goods, excepting snch as are in immediate demand, have been reduced, and similar action was taken during the past week on bleached sheets, pillowcases, &c. Some of the new prices are the lowest in nine years. Certain branded muslin lines are expected to be repriced on a lower basis within a short time. Underwear will also soon ba placed on a lower basis, probably at the beginning of next month. Little change is expected in hosiery prices. The opening of sweater lines will take place this week.

Situation in Wool and Woolens.

Last week's auction sales of wool in various parts of Australia served to emphasize the tendency toward lower prices for practically all varieties except the very finest merinos. At the new levels, however, stocks have been moving quite well. This week a lot of crossbreds will be offered at Wellington, New Zealand. No marked change in prices is expected to be shown. In South Africa recently, H. C. Frielinghaus, President of the Produce Section of the Durban Chamber of Commerce, gave it as his opinion that tbe prices for wool eeemed to buyers to be out of all proportion to values. He added that tha quality of the wool seemed to be detsriorating. Protests by the trade on this last matter had been met by statements from Government officials that the farmers should pay no attention to the criticism. To tbie Mr. Frielinghaus retorted by sayine that "it was for the Govefnment experts who knew about breeding sheep to tell the farmers how tbey wool was to be grown, but not to lay down what sort of wool was wanted by the trade." This suggestion may bave a wider application than to South Africa alone. Trading in wool in this country continues limited in scope. Imports, also, are restricted in quantity. In the week ended Nov 6, tbere were received here a total of 4,535,844 pounds, of which 3,470,025 wsre of carpet wool. There is a lull in the goods market aftsr a fairly busy spell on Spring requirements. Clothiers are still engaged in pushing their merchandise for that season. The settlement of "ne long strike in the garment trade and the beginning of a similar settlement in tbe New Jersey woolen mills are hopeful signs of renewed activity in the women's wear field.

FROWN ON GIFTS TO STORE BUYERS

Movement to Stop the Practice Is Receiving the Support of Many Houses.

Hundreds of retailers all over the country are backing the movement started a week ago by the United Women's Wear League of America to eliminate the so-called gift evil, wbich assumes such great proportions at the approach of the boliday season. The promptness with which offers of cooperation have come from executives of retail stores shows plainly that progressivs merchants are as fully aware as the manufacturers of the harm worked by this practice.

In a statement issued yesterday by the league setting forth the views of executives of a number of prominsnt stores in various parts of the country on the quqestion, the assertion is made that retail sntimsnt is unanimously against the practice of buyers' accepting gifts from manufcturers. While some retailers take it for granted that the buyers in their employ do not receive gifts from the houses from which they buy merchandise, others offer to cooperate beyond a mere exchange of letters. Still others ask the league for information which would show that their bnyers do accept presents.

Several local stores are numbered among those who have so far responded to the movement begun by the league. Best & Co. comment in this way: "We are strongly opposed to manufacturers' making gifts at Christmas time, or any other time, to any members of our organization. Our instructions to our representatives have for years been very positive on this point and well understood, and if there have been any infractions of the rule they have been without either our consent or knowledge. It is obvious that buyers of the right sort would be careful to refuse gifts of this kind."

Saks-Herald Square "considers it a breach of contract if any of our buyers accept any gratuity from manufacturers." Oppenheim, Collins & Co. have "always heen against this practice." James A. Hearn & Son assure the league that gifts are absolutely forbidden to their buyers.

The Powers Mercantile Company of Minneapolis expresees hearty agreement with the movement and says: "Our instructions to our buyers are against the policy of accepting gratuities from manufacturers." The Chamberlain-Johnson-DuBoee Company of Atlanta writes to the league that "We will cooperate with you heartily in trying to avoid any possibility of this evil existing in our store. We will again discuss the matter with our buyers and stress the importance of keeping absolntely free of any such entanglement."

Montgomery Ward & Co., Chicago, are also against the practice, saying in their reply to the league's letter that "we are very mnch opposed to this practice, as it makes it a little harder for them (the buyers) to say 'No' when merchandise is being offered to them by the manufacturer who has favored them with an expensive Christmas gift." They also offer to cooperate farther in eliminating the evil.

The Gilchrist Company of Boston expresses the belief that their buyers are not guilty of accepting such gifts, but if they are we would like to know about it." G. Fox & Co., Hartford, Conn., have, they replied, repeatedly discussed this question with their buyers, and have prohibited tbe acceptance of gifts of any nature, even cigars and candy. "You can naturally undsrstand," they write, "that some of these salesmen may be personal friends of some of our buyers, but this matter is reaching such a condition that every effort should be made to eliminate gifts, and wa would be delighted to cooperate with you in every possible way."

L. S. Ayres & Co., Indianapolis, consider the practice so dangerous to the integrity of trade relations and so difficult to handle that they have given instructions in their receiving room to refer all "suspicious-looking packages" to their merchandise managers. In their letter to the league they say that "in each case where we can identify such packages, we have our buyers return them immediately with a note indicating that the acceptance of such gifts will mean their instant dismissal." This firm says it will welcome any efforts on the part of the league to curb this evil.

Woodward & Lothrop, Washington, say that they have even asked their buyers to return small gifts like candy or flowers, and add: "Should you at any time hear even a rumor that any of our buyers are receiving any kind of gifts we would thank you very much to let us know in order that we may investigate." The Joslin Dry Goode Company of Denver expresses its willingness to endorse any movement that will tend to destroy "these vicious practices." Burdin's, Miami, reports the recent discharge of two buyers for accepting gifts from manufacturers. This store, incidentally, took up the matter in question with manufacturers some time ago on its own initiative, recognizing the need of cooperation in overcoming the evil.

Among other retailers who have signified their interest in the movement are O'Neill & Co., Baltimore; the Hecbt Co., Washington; Lansburgh & Bro., Washington; the Denver Dry Goods Company, Denver; Joel Gutman & Co., Baltimore; Sibley, Lindsay & Curr, Rochester; the Stewart Dry Goods Co., Louisville; ths Palais Royal, Washington; J. J. Siegrist & Co., Buffalo; the F. R. Lazarus Company, Columbus; the Edwin Malley Company, New Haven; the Wm. Leve Dry Goods Company, Newport; W. H. Roland, Bloomington, Ill.; Cromer-Cassel's, Miami; the Callender, McAuslan & Troup Company, Providence; the Howland Dry Goods Company, Bridgeport; the Crosby Bros. Company, Topeka; Tomkins Dry Goods Company, Middleton, N. Y.; the Bon Ton Department Store, Lebanon, Pa.; Wm. F. Gabis & Co., Altoona, Pa.; Harmed & Von Maur, Davenport, Iowa; Wolf & Dessauer, Fort Wayne, Ind., and the Newman Dry Goods Company, Arkansas City, Kan.

"These retailers were among the first to reply," the statement comments. "Their letters evince not only an agreement with the league's attitude but the fact that many of them are signed with the names of presidents and vice-presidents shows that the matter is of interest to those in authority, many of whom are willing to subject their own buying etaffs to scrutiny.

"No attempt to fix the blame for the present state of affairs is made either by the leagus or by the retailers. It is generally agreed that the situation, being hers musi bs deali with as a fact, with the responsibility for its elimination resting witb manufacturer and retailer alike. A plan for taking additional steps in the movement is being formulated by the league, and when ready, will be presented to retailers for their further cooperation."

Want to Tax Unimproved Realty.

A bill has been introduced in the New South Wales Parliament proposing a tax on the unimproved value of large estates, with the object of dividing large holdings of land and encouraging closer settlement.

GARMENTS WHICH NOW APPEAL TO RETAILERS

Include Those for Afternoon and Resort Wear, Fur Coats and Children's Outfits.

There has been a noticeable demand during the week for afternoon dresses of the better type selling for $49.50 and up, according to Alfred Fanti, New York resident representative. The most wanted models, he says, are of georgette, georgette and velvet combinations, transparent velvet in plain grounds and novelty effects and black eatin trimmed with metallio touches or fabric of contrasting color. Dinner gowns retailing from $89.50 are being called for in velvet and in elaborately beaded chiffon. For the young miss, the youthful "robe ds style" continues an outstanding fashion, developed in taffeta, velvet or plain and novelty metallic cloths.

"Dress buyers from Southern stores," Mr. Fanti's report goes on, "have come to the local market to make initial purchases of apparel suitable for Southern resort wear. Among the most wanted numbers are one and two piece sports frocks of silk crêpe, plain and fancy jersay fabrics and novelty printed sports silks selling for $35 up. Tbe composé dress carried out in contrasting materials and color combinations is much in demand. Two-piece costumes, consisting of a sleeveless tennis dress and a hip-length jacket of contrasting fabric, are enjoying considerable favor.

"Orders now coming in from coat departments lay particular stress npon garments to retail at $89.50, consisting mainly of straight-line models in the pile fabrics, trimmed with long-haired furs. Thus far this season, due to mild weather in many sections of the country, the consumer buying of Winter coats has been far below expectations. Many manufacturers now have coats to offer at a reduction for prompt delivary, but price concessions are not as appreciahs as in recent years, due to higher prices earlier in the season resulting from the strike.

"A good business is being done on fur coats retailing for $200 to $500. Tailored pony coats and models of flat caracul in the beige tones trimmed with fox to match are among the best sellers in this range. In the more expensive coats, broadtail and krimmer are being favored.

"In junior and children's wear a big business is helng done in coats of suede cloth and holivia trimmed with squirrel, beaver or nutria selling within the price range of $25 and $49.50. There is also a growing call for fur-trimmed coats of novelty plaid fabrics retailing from $39.50 to $75. Girls' velvet dresses selling for $5.95 to $10.95 are in popular demand, principally in black, jungle green and wine. Girls' party dresses selling for $10 to $29.50 are being called for, in high-colored crêpe de chine and georgette. Infants' departments are having many calls for fancy knitwear suitable for Christmas gifts, as well as hat and coat sets.

"An important boliday item in underwear departments is the négligée of plain or brocaded chiffon velvet, crêpe-back satin or crêpe ds chine, trimmed with ostrich or marabou, retailing for $25 np. The Vionnet sleeve is an outstanding feature of many of these models. Bed jackets of quilted satin or albatross are also wanted to sell for $3.95 up. There is a big call for lingerie of the better type in both tailored and elaborately lace-trimmed numbers of ninon, crêpe-back satin and crêpe de chine selling for $10.95 np.

"In men's wear an articls in popular demand is a muffler of washable silk, with woven dots and figures, selling for $2 to $2.50. A big selling imported novelty is the square of printed eilk, retailing for $5. Men's pure wool sweaters in tbe shaker stitcb are wanted to sell for $6.95 to $10. the turtle neck style being extremely popular."

SILHOUETTES FOR SPRING.

Most Popular of Them is the Jacket and Its Variations.

From the standpoint of an outstanding Spring silhouette in the dress trade the most popular is that of the jacket and its variations. That the bolero or Eton line is hy no means an exhausted style has been proved by the novelty and smartness of the developments of this featnre in the recent French couture openings.

As it appeared in the collections of Jenny, Philippe & Gaston, Agnes, Lelong, Jane Regny, Chantal and others, the bolero introduced the sleeveless version above both long sleeve and sleeveless dress types. It was slashed or tucked, bound in self fabric, ribbon and braid. Elaboration was obtained through parallel rows of stitching as decorative detail and also through embroidery and appliqué work.

Note was taken hy stylists here of the use of wida flat suede or novelty leather belts, narrow "harness" belts or the "gypsy sash" at the juncture of jacket edge and skirt. The influence of the high waistline in tiered evening and afternoon modes continues and appears in sports wear as a jacket-dress. The tiered idea is rstained, hut is greatly simplified. Good results are obtained in this handling when the jacket section hugs close to the figure and the skirt is reduced to two tiers. These serve to mark the "return" to the old-time double ekirt contour.

The redingote, another mucb exploited silhouette, also assumes the sleeveless guise hy its rendition in a fine kasha, rep or wool crêpe upper section, worn over a dull or lustrous silk crêpe underdress. Heavy sheer crêpes and the newer silk textures, which combine well with the lightest weight woolens, occasionally reverse this fabric usage.

Two-piece styles have changed in type, but remain in both foreign and domestic collections, as leading influenti.' modes for Southern resort and midsummer wear.

FINAL SALE AT CLAFLINS.

Last of the Stock to Be Disposed of Beginning Tomorrow.

Tomorrow will mark the beginning of the end of one of the oldeet dry goods jobbing houses in the country, when the stock of Claflins Incorporated, which was formerly known as H. B. Claflin & Co. and the H. B. Claflin Corporation, will be put on sale prior to the final winding up of the concern's affairs on Nov. 30.

Response to the announcement of the sale has been immediate, according to executives of ths house, and from present indications the great bulk of the offerings will be disposed of before the current week is out. The indicated demand is such, in fact, that a very large part of the stock available will probably be cleaned up by Tuesday night. These stocks include all of the merchandise regularly carried, with the exception of linings, curtains and upholsteries, silks and domestic rugs and linoleums. These hav already been sold in bulk to single purchasers.

Present signs point to a large attendance of buyers from all over, the country, and thers is plenty of reason to believe that the final days of the old house, the passing of which has occasioned general regret in the dry goods trade, will be among ths business it has ever experienced in the more than eighty years of its existence.

PUSHING HOLIDAY TRADE.

Displays by the Stores Continually Made More Elehorete.

From present indications, more elaborate means than ever before will be taken by retail stores througbout the country to signalize the "official" opening of the Christmas holiday selling period. Not only will the undertakings be more lavish and expensive on the part of stores which bave carried them on in the last coupla of years, but the number of stores featuring them is growing larger every year, according to observers in close touch with developments.

One of the outstanding tbings that will he done hy several storee is the holding of a gigantic parade on Thanksgiving Day, announcing the arrival of Santa Claus and all bis fairyland and story-hook oohorts. In one case, it was said yesterday, a Middle Weet store is arranging to have Santa come by airplane to a landing place not far from the store. He will be met by a reception committee and a parade will escort him to the store, which proclaims itself his headquarters.

The parade and greeting idea is being worked in other forms by the stores and serves to concentrate attention on the fact that tbe stores are now ready to handle all of their Christmas customers. To the children it has the same appeal as the old-time circus parade and its advertising value as such justifies the cost to the store, in the opinion of those who favor it. Its main object, they say, is the creation, not only in the mind of the child but in the adult as well, of added prestige for the store as a Christmas shopping headquarters.

Moreover, the Christmas display and entertainments within the store itself are taking on a more lavisb character each year. While some doubt has been expressed as to the actual gain of the store for so great an outlay, the fact that so many stores heve adopted this means of interesting consumers indicates the widespread belief in its affectiveness.

TO HELP SALE OF LACES.

United Effort in the Industry to Extend the Use of Them.

Stimulation of consumer and wholesale demand through organized and coperative effort is being undertaken in a number of industries at the present time, the lace trade here being the latest to employ this means. For several seasons past, lace importers and manufacturers have been faced with a situation developing ontside the trade itself, resulting in a curtailment of demand. Among the important developments were the falling off in the use of laces as trimming for underwear, which represents a big volums, and the lack of style trends favorable to the use of lace on outer garments.

Leaders in the trade have for some tima realized that steps to combat these infinences should be taksn. The plan as finally worked out is to further the style sponsorship of laces in the fashion centres abroad and here. The couturieres are said to have expreased commendation of the effort and to have promised their full support. Consumers are being reached through information on laces published in the leading fashion publications. Ths wholesalers themselves are being much more closely knit together in the realization that cooperation means just as much for the individual manufacturer as it does for the trade as a whole.

The net result is that the trada is inclined to view the prospects for the coming Spring with a great deal more confidence. This is svidenced by the reversal of the decisions of leading importers to send no buyers to Europe to purchase for the Spring. Buyers have gone ehroad for ten or more of ths leading lace firms. They are now assembling a collection of laces, with emphasis placed on every purchase that it meet the full demands of fashion here.

ATTIRE FOR STOUT WOMEN.

Output of It for Reeort Season Larger Than Ever Before.

Production of stout wear for the Southern resort season will be on a more extensive scale this year than ever before, according to leading manufacturers of these garments. The growth of ths style factor in this type of merchandise is responsible for the increased interest in "Palm Beach" apparel being shown by the producers.

Commenting on the developments taking place, one well known manufacturer pointed out that not so long ago stout wear for the Spring was not usually offered until late in December. Styling of the merchandise was along cartain fixed lines. The novel touches that abound at present were considered too extreme or bizarre to be featured in large women's dresses. There was also a general tendancy to wait until the season was well advanced before new showings were made.

This condition has changed radically, be added. The large woman wants to see the new styles as early as her more slender sister and she insists that the prevailing fashion features he represented in the garments produced for her. Soutl'ern resort collections are presented as early as those of style houses making regular sizes because retailers seem to want a good assortment of stout frocks during December.

Japanese interests are reported to be planning the construction of a soda-ash plant in Kwantung Leased Territory (South Manchuria), with a capitalization of 10,000,000 yen.

BUSINESS NOTES.

Ths broad silk stock of Claflins Incorporated, which was purchased in its entirety by the Robert Rosenthal-Schoolhouse Corporation, will be offered tomorrow morning to the cutting-up and retail trades. The sale will be held in the Lefcourt-Madison Building on Thirty-fourth Street, between Madison and Fifth Avenues, where the entire ninth floor will be given over to it.

Robinson & Zimmerman, manufacturers of dresses, 270 West Thirty-eighth Street, have engaged Charles A. Little to cover New England for them. He was formerly with the Betty Wales Costume Company and the Ed Garrick Company. S. G. Robinson, who formerly covered New England for the firm, will in the future cover New York State and give increased attention to the production end of the business.

L. Stiller & Sons will hold a convention of American and foreign shoe retailers handling their merchandise at the firm's Long Island factory. The gathering, which is primarily social, will begin on Tuesday and continue all week. A number of special entertainment features are scheduled, including the appearance of prominent screen and other actresses.

Arrangements have been completed by the Affiliated Specialists in Dresses for Short Women with a well-known French commissionaire to represent them in Paris, according to an announcement made yesterday by Managing Director Charles E. May.

EXTENDING SALES OF DRESS GOODS

Appeal to Women Who Have a Preference for Individuality in Their Attire.

Among the most important adjuncts in extending sales in the dry goods departments of retail stores are the increased service features to conenmers, the efficient handling of the needs of the mature woman and the placing of emphasis on the value of yard goods in assuring individuality in dress. This summing up was made yesterday by P. V. Bouterse, divisional merchandise manager of L. Bamberger & Co., who told of practical methods of meeting these needs, which are effectively producing a larger retail piece goods turnover.

"It is an unquestioned fact that yard goods ars becoming increasingly important," said Mr. Bouterse. "Too great a standardization of women's apparel is having a reaction. Women do not want to becoms 'Fordized.' They want individuality in drsss and for many of them, particularly the mature woman, the only way it can be obtained is through the piece goods department. That the demand sxists le proved by the Government statement that 150,000,000 patterns were sold last year. Each one of these patterns is a yard goods prescription."

From the retail standpoint, Mr. Bouterse said, the "do-nothing beyond the sale" attitude has become passé. The alert and progressive piece goods department is now showing and teaching the customer what she can do with the piece goods that attract her or that she purchases. This includes a sew service shop where manikins parade, fashion talks are given, a dress made weekly out o: the piece goods on sale and where every effort is made to teach the individual customer the actual sewing, trimming and color design details.

"That such work is effective is demonstrated heyond question in the increased sales totals," he continued. "I have had customers, particularly those who are in the 'fair, fat and forty' classification, tell me that the service rendered has enabled them to have many more dresses. One in particular told me she had more dresses this season than all of last year, when she had to rely solely on what she could get in ready-made garments. All of this means increased piece goods sales.

"It is a fact that the mature woman has more money to spend than the so-called flapper. And it also appears to be a fact that a large percentags of these women cannot be suited with ready-to-wear garments. In the first place, they have considerable difficulty in the matter of sises. If yon are observant you can almost hear the comment made by a bleeched blond saleslady in the ready-to-wear department when a 'fair, fat and forty' customer comes in. These things, every effort to avoid them to the contrary, serve to irritate the customer, who naturaly turns elsewhere.

"Then, too, the mature woman, being usually better fixed financially, desires garments that are not standardized, and she is begining to feel that she can get the individual styling and fitting that she wants through the piece goods departments. It means largely increased sales, for it must be remem- t there really are no 'old women' today.

"To do its work effectively, the piece goode department must recreate in the customer's mind bow the goods will look when made up into a dress. The consumer probahly had some such idea when she came into the store, but by the time the uncooperating attitude in the piece goods department had its effect, coupled with the fact that she had to go through almost the entire store to match up the goods with notions, trimmings and so on, it was probahly effectually driven out.

"Proper cooperation will recreate what the customer had in her mind, and the clearer view of how the goods will look when made up serves to break down price resistence. More standard goods will be sold and the customer will be far better satisfied.

"Economy may truly be said to be no longsr the main appeal of the piece goods department. It still possesses much of that advantage, of course, but mass production of garments with resulting lower prices has lessened that appeal. But such production has brought with it more or less standardized styles, and this standardization is beginning to enlarge the scope of piece goods sales. An increasingly large number of women feel that the only way they can express themselves in dress is to make their garments themselves or have them made by dressmakers.

"Mention of dressmakers brings up another thought. The old time dressmaker no longer meets the needs of today. The name itself is not in good favor, lacking the suggestion of skill and design that is needed for the making of garments for the up-to-date woman. How can the consumer get real design and tailoring treatment from a 'dressmaker,' who is probably nothing more than a local seamstress, for the comparatively small charges that now prevail in this occupation?

"A change, however, is coming in this field in my opinion. It will be brought about by the introduction of the same type of clever women who are now running tea rooms, art stores and the like. The class possesses native artistic design ahility but dislikes the term 'dressmaker' with its more or less servile connotations.

"This, together with the comparatively small financial return, are reasons why they are not taking up the work in the numbers it deserves. But I foresee more of them doing this with a new vision. There will then be need of a new term for them—something on the order of fashion artist—which will adequately describe the work they will do.

"All this means two things, the combating of standardized styles and garmsnts, and more sales for the piece goods departments alert enough to grasp the possibilities."

STILL MORE SPECIALIZING.

Sections in Stores for Those After Particular Articles.

The vogue for what might be called ultra-specialization in department stores continues to spread. Only a few years ago the various goods sold by thee establishments were offered in a relatively few major departments, hut nowadays things are different. Not only have some of the more important of these departments, particularly those handling apparel, been subdivided into special sections for "stouts" and "smalls," but there has even been subdividing of fabric denartments into special sections featuring goods of a certain kind or price class.

Not all of the specialization of departments has been confined to thoee handling women's apparel or general merchandise. Special departments for men's wear have been in existence for some time, and in many storeg they are so arranged as to be accessible without contact with crowds of women shoppers. Of late, however, the subdivision of men's departments, or rather one grouping together in separate locations of certain kinds of merchandise to appeal to a particular class of male patrons, has come into vogue. An instance of this is the establishment by a local store of a special department featuring merchandise of appeal to college men. So much stress is laid on this section that, prior to its opening, the man in charge of it was sent on an intensive tour of leading Eastern colleges in order properly to post himself on the mode collegiate.

BEARDSLEY'S WORK IN ART SALE HERE

Lane's Collection of Drawings and Posters to Be Dispersed According to His Will.

'SALOME' ILLUSTRATIONS

Charcoal Sketch of Artist Himself—Most of Collection Bought Direct From the Artist.

When John Lane, an English publisher, who brought out "The Yellow Book," died in 1924, he left instructions in his will that of his collection of Aubrey Beardsley's drawings a single example should be presented to each of the following: The National Gallery, the Victoria and Albert Museum, the British Museum and the Brighton Art Gallery, and that the remainder should be sold by the Anderson Galleries in New York.

It so happens that the President of the Anderson Galleries, Mitchell Kennerley, was an office boy for Lane in London when Beardsley took his famous drawings to the publisher for use in "The Yellow Book." Later Mr. Kennerley was manager of the first branch office which Lane established in New York.

There are fifty-seven lots listed for this sale, and Lot 46 includes eleven drawings that illustrated Oscar Wilde's "Salome," among them being "The Woman in the Moon," "The Peacock Skirt," "The Black Cape" and "The Eyes of Herod."

The miniature "Masked Pierrot," a vignette for the title page to "Plays," by John Davidson, is another offering that is regarded highly. A drawing for Grant Allen's novel, "The British Barbarians," has a housemaid serving tea in a garden, and another drawing for the title page of a parody on the novel "The Barbarous Britishers," by H. D. Trail, is a caricature of the former, with a tough slavey in place of the pleasing housemaid.

The drawings from "The Yellow Book" are "Venus," in a low-necked modern gown; "A Nocturne of Chopin" and "Courtship Under the Third Empire."

Ninety per cent. of the collection was purchased by John Lane from Beardsley himself, but the twenty drawings grouped as "Juvenilia" were purchased from the artist's mother, Mrs. Ellen Beardsley, about three years ago, and two others, "Arbuscula," an illustration for Vuillier's "History of Dancing," an edition de luxe published in London in 1897, and a poster done about 1894, showing a woman in walking costume with a leash in her left hand, both used by the late William Heinemann, were bought by Lane at the Heinemann sale.

Drawings for the title pages of the keynote series of novels, originals and translations, published by John Lane, include a variety of Beardsley's designs. Another example is "La Maitresse d'Orchestra," also reproduced as "Salome on Settle."

There are charcoal drawings of Henry Harland, editor of "The Yellow Book," and of Beardsley himself, art editor of the magazine. These were published first in The Sketch, London, on April 11, 1894. Other drawings were for "Venus and Tannhäuser," "Pierrot's Library," "Sappho" and Davidson's "Earl Lavender."

Spanish Antiques to Be Sold.

A collection of Spanish antiques belonging to Montillor Brothers of the Spanish Antique Shop of New York and Palm Beach are now being shown at the Plaza Art Auction Rooms and will be sold Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday afternoons. Decorated plates, floral paintings, metal and glass pole lanterns, textiles, bronze, marble and wrought iron articles, terra-cotta bowls and vases and numerous pieces of furniture are among the hundreds of objects listed.

APPEALS FOR JEWISH FUND.

Head of B'nai B'rith Stresses Need of $2,000,000.

CINCINNATI, Ohio, Nov. 13.—Alfred M. Cohen, International President of the Independent Order B'nai B'rith, and Henry Monsky, Chairman of the Wider Scope Committee of the order, have launched a campaign to raise $2,000,000 for Jewish cultural and relief work. This campaign will be conducted in hundreds of cities from coast to coast, and it is expected that the fund will be completed before the end of this year.

This is the first national drive ever conducted by the I. O. B. B., which is a Jewish fraternal order established in Cincinnati in 1843 and which today has nearly 100,000 members in 500 lodges, who represent all elements of American Jewry.

"One million dollars of the two million sought will go for the extension of the Hillel Foundation movement, which has been successfully established at four Midwestern universities. This is a movement to stimulate a Jewish consciousness in the college youth and to provide Jewish leaders for the future.

"Among cultural activities to which another quarter of a million dollars has been allocated is the extension of the work of the Alaph Zadik Aleph, A Jewish youth organization, whose membership will be dedicated to the protection and advancement of American and Jewish ideals. One-quarter of a million dollars is to be set aside for the Anti-Defamation League, which for more than ten years has defended the good name of the Jew from libel and caricature on the stage, screen and in the press. Still another quarter of a million will be devoted to the emergency relief fund in disasters similar to that which recently occurred in Florida, and to the aid of the thousands of European Jews who have recently made their homes in Mexico and are still in the process of self-adjustment. And last, the B'nai B'rith desires a quarter of a million dollars for a loan fund which will be used for the erection of a model home community, known as Garden City, near Jerusalem."

A national campaign committee has been organized. This includes Louis W. Osterweis, Maurice Bloch, A. E. Freyer and Charles Hartman of New York.

German Artist's Work on View.

Etchings and water colors by Hermann Struck are to be exhibited today from 10 A. M. to 6 P. M. by the Society for the Advancement of Judaism at 15 West Eighty-sixth Street. The artist is one of the few Germans elected to membership in the Royal Society of Painter-etchers and Engravers and first attracted attention by an etching of Gerhart Hauptmann in 1904. His portraits include Wilde, Nansen, Nietzsche, Haeckel, Jacob H. Schiff and Professor Einstein.

Everything Edgar Allan Poe Ever Wrote!

16 volumes in one

FROM the mind of the greatest American writer of all time came poems, stories and essays enough to fill sixteen volumes. Poems that haunt the memory with their heart-breaking song of despair. Tales that may scarcely be read after dark lest the phantoms pursue the reader in every shadow. Tales of mystery so baffling, so intricate that none but their author could ever solve them. Essays so original that all Europe proclaimed their author America's sole contribution to international literature up to that time.

Unappreciated while he lived, Edgar Allan Poe's fame has increased steadily since his death until today no man may call himself well read without a knowledge of his works.

Today the complete works of Edgar Allan Poe are yours in a single volume only an inch and a half thick! The life of the ill-fated genius is also here revealed in the reminiscences of N. P. Willis and James Russell Lowell, intimates who knew best the facts of his wild, tragic life.

Two thousand pages of the finest genuine India paper. So finely woven that it is almost without weight, yet so white and opaque that the large type stands forth crystal clear.

Its compact size makes this a book that fits comfortably into the hand. Its beautiful, heavily grained covers, with gold titles, make it a decoration for your table top.

It required the best in paper making, printing and the bookbinder's art to create a volume to match the brilliance of this writer. The book stands as a masterpiece of publishing art. We are proud to allow you to judge its every merit for yourself.

Will you examine it FREE?

Without a penny cost to you and without obligating yourself in any way you may have this book to inspect at your leisure, to read and judge for a week. Then, if you have not fallen irresistibly under Poe's enthralling spell, if you do not feel that this is a book you must own, simply return it at our expense and the matter is closed.

You risk nothing by mailing the coupon. You lose a great opportunity by not doing so. Tear it out now, before turning the page. You need send no money. There is nothing to pay on delivery.

ENGLAND'S CONDUCT OF THE WAR

Field Marshal Robertson Condemns Civilian Interference

SOLDIERS AND STATESMEN. By Field Marshal Sir William Robertson. Two volumes. Illustrated. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $12.*

By P. W. WILSON

SIR WILLIAM ROBERTSON, now a Field Marshal, can be most briefly described, perhaps, as the Ludendorff of the British Army. When French retired from the western front he was offered that command, but preferred to act as Chief of the General Staff in London. And in this position he was responsible for the supervision of British activities in every field, offering advice and taking decisions which involved hundreds of thousands of lives and many billions of money.

Amid oceans of propaganda Robertson has written a book which, however great may be the sensations in its pages, is simple, sincere and soldierly. Indeed, he states so fairly the views opposed to his own that, as it will seem to many, he disproves or at least discounts his own case. Where at times he is unjust it is by omission only. And his tone fully explains why, in character and mental equipment, he won and retains so wide a prestige.

The interest in this book centres around Robertson's controversies with David Lloyd George and his colleagues over the conduct of the war. Robertson deals, therefore, with the relations which should be maintained between the General Staff, consisting of professional soldiers, and the Cabinet, consisting of civilian statesmen. And he makes the large concession that > the activities of war embrace every element of the national life and [that] upon the Cabinet devolves the responsibility for combining the whole military, naval, diplomatic, financial and economic forces of the nation for the defeat of the enemy.

But he does not fail to protest that these discussions gravely hamper a Chief of Staff in the performance of his duties. He tells how the agenda of the morning was delayed by "the publication of a politically objectionable newspaper article," or by "fear of industrial troubles," or, worse still, by "criticisms of military matters gleaned by Ministers during a visit to the front or received in a letter from a constituent or heard at a dinner table the previous evening."

In passing, it may be remarked that Lloyd George tried to give Robertson the right of way by inviting him to breakfast, but that Robertson did not enjoy these now historic repasts. A more important consideration is the fact that only too often the War Office gave an occasion for letters from constituents and for paragraphs in the press. The Field Marshal himself sets out statistics which show how gravely the department failed to foresee the demand for high explosive shells, in which connection he might perhaps have mentioned Colonel Repington's warning to The London Times and Lloyd George's Ministry of Munitions. It is also significant that Robertson, in presenting his plea for the soldier against the civilian, does not allude to the tanks which were forced on the War Office by civilian pressure. There again the casual conversation of the Cabinet helped to win the war.

Robertson argues that Generals when left to themselves "understand" one another. Yet in these very volumes he tells us frequently of the disastrous misunderstandings of these eminent men. General Nivelle addressed Lord Haig as if he were a junior Lieutenant. Marshal Pétain declined also to cooperate. At Saloniki General Sarrail and the other allied commanders were on such bad terms that the French Minister of War had to be sent for. The distinguished commanders revealed in these pages are as sensitive over their dignity as opera singers.

By implication Robertson himself recognizes this truth. For he insists that, even at a moment of supreme emergency, a Prime Minister must avoid "like the plague" any idea of "seeking a second opinion"—that is, from other officers, however illustrious—of a General's qualifications. Apparently the soldiers who so thoroughly understand one another cannot be trusted without personal emotion to estimate one another's abilities in the field. For the winning of a great war something more is required, after all, than an understanding of one another by a few Generals in high position. The facts that the soldiers misunderstood Ireland and at the critical moment drove her to rebellion, that they tried to impose Episcopalian chaplains on Baptist Wales and that they undervalued the territorial troops, whose efficiency proved to be fully equal to that of the regular army, should be added to Robertson's narrative. Nor is it to be wondered at that statesmen, responsible to mankind for casualties running to tens of thousands a week and faced by instance after instance such as these, began to question the infallibility of the General Staff, even in the final issues of strategy.

Robertson here bases himself on the remarkable statement of Viscount Grey that "if military opinion be incompetent and wrong, no Government can save the country from defeat." In a war decided by a single and immediate battle that may sometimes be true. But, as applied to a war prolonged over years, there are few statements, we suppose, which have been more frequently falsified by history. We need only refer to the proverb that England herself loses every battle except the last.

Be that as it may, Robertson claims for the General Staff an exclusive right to determine all questions of strategy, however far-reaching they may be. He agrees that "plans of campaign are, and must be, now analyzed and criticised by civilian Ministers at the council table in a way quite unknown a few decades ago." But with regard to any alternative plans suggested by the civilian Ministers, the only duty of the military chief is "to explain and substantiate his objections" and to defeat the "persuasion and dialectical skill" by which such plans might "get adopted." In a sentence, a plan however bad, if advanced by the military chief, is orthodox; but plans however good, if advanced by any one else, are, ipso facto, to be dismissed, in Robertson's words, as "tiresome heresies."

Field Marshal Sir William Robertson, K. C. B.

The orthodox plan was that the war must be won on the western front. This did not mean merely that the western front should be held firm. It meant that no operations should be undertaken anywhere except on the western front, and that, whatever the casualties and whatever the absence of results, there should be, on the western front, a perpetual offensive. In dealing with Robertson, as these pages abundantly demonstrate, the Cabinet was confronted not by a man at all with free reasoning abilities, but by a syllogism, which, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, altereth not. Nothing that arose from day to day was considered on merits. The test for everything was whether it would alienate a man or a gun from the killing, next year, in France and Flanders.

On the theory of the business, Lloyd George held that "the fatal error committed in the present war had always been to attack where the enemy was strongest instead of at the point where he is weakest." And with this view Smuts seems to have agreed.

Anyway, the western frontiers left Serbia to be crushed, Bulgaria to be drawn into the alliance of western powers, Rumania to be overrun, Turkey to triumph over Armenians and even Russians, and Greece to betray the Balkans. The theory was that nothing of this would matter so long as there were plenty of soldiers and shells to be flung into what Lloyd George doubtless regarded as the shambles of the Somme. If the war was won there, it would be lost everywhere else. And Lloyd George's idea of "knocking down the props" that supported the western front was to be answered with ironical superiority.

That Lloyd George could find little evidence of imagination in "the plan" is stated frankly by Robertson. He also concedes that two years ahead of the revolution Lloyd George foresaw the collapse of Russia, a detail not included in the calculations of the General Staff. Despite urgent appeals from the Grand Duke Nicholas, therefore, and despite a serious threat by the Turks to the Suez Canal and Egypt, the General Staff went as far as they dared to condemn the campaign in Gallipoli, which, as these pages abundantly prove, could not have succeeded against such avowed professional prejudice. The failure in Gallipoli was followed in due course by the release of the German Army from service in the east and its further concentration in the west. The prop that was to have been knocked down was turned into a battering ram.

And yet, eight years after the armistice, Robertson appears to be still unconscious that there has been the least thing amiss with the infallibility of the General Staff at the War Office. Most people have come to the conclusion that Allenby's campaigns have been among the most brilliant in military annals. To Robertson, even today, they were "fantastical." And he treats the capture of Jerusalem as a mental aberration. It did not win the war on the western front.

If, indeed, the war had been so won in France and Flanders, Robertson's reasoning would doubtless be difficult to answer. But by the month of August, 1917, it was only too evident that the calculation had been a miscalculation. Even Foch, wrote Robertson, "seems to have made up his mind that it is hopeless looking for good results on the west front," which "will make my task much harder." Indeed, he adds, "I confess I stick to it [the plan] more because I see nothing better, and because my instinct prompts me to stick to it, than because of any good argument by which I can support it." And in forcing the offen- (Continued on Page 14)

Guinevere Runs Off With Mr. Erskine's "Galahad"

As the Woman Who Made the Young Knight What He Was, She Dominates the Story

GALAHAD. Enough of His Life to Explain His Reputation. By John Erskine. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.50.

By ELMER DAVIS

HIS strength was as the strength of ten because his head was thick. So Mr. Erskine would rewrite Tennyson, and proceeds to inquire into the reasons for this remarkable opacity. In part it was sheer stubbornness inherited from his mother, Elaine. Not the Lily Maid of Astolat, who appears late and briefly in the story, but Elaine, King Pelles's daughter, who saw Lancelot in his youth, after one of his numerous quarrels with Guinevere, and went after him. This Elaine was a determined young feminist, as free from inhibitions as Lorelei Lee; and the impartial observer concludes that Lancelot finally yielded to her embraces because it was the only way to make her stop talking. (No doubt a good many affairs, and a good many marriages, begin for no better reason than that, nor is the gentleman always the injured party.)

But Elaine, when Lancelot had left her, lived on in the country with the son she bore him, and not till Galahad came to court at the age of 17 did his character crystallize—crystallise is too mild a word; it set like concrete—under the influence of a woman. This relationship is not what the irreverent reader might expect; Galahad's celebrated purity is left unassailed except by a rather shopworn and perfunctory lady-in-waiting, who could hardly have been so very perilous, even to a young man fresh from the farm. The woman who really damned Galahad, by exercising a good influence over him, was Guinevere.

Guinevere, not the laudable but unappetizing Galahad, is the principal personage of the story; and with this reinterpretation of Guinevere, following his reinterpretation of Helen, John Erskine takes his proper place as one of the principal fomenters of happiness in marriage, and pillars of the sanctity of the home. For nothing is better calculated to make the Average Man married to the Average Woman contented with his lot than this appalling demonstration of what it must have been like to live with Helen or Guinevere.

Helen was the honest outspoken woman; Guinevere is the inspirational woman, the woman of high ideals. "I could love only one kind of man," she says to Lancelot, "the kind that makes a difference in the world, who builds something, who always goes on. • • • When I found Arthur was satisfied with himself, and couldn't imagine a career, none even when I pointed it out, there was nothing for me to help him in. I turned to you for the chance to live."

This was bad news for Lancelot, who wanted Guinevere because he wanted her, "not to improve you and not by way of expressing a criticism of your husband." For unfortunately he and Arthur had pretty well cleaned up the country and abolished all the ogres, dragons and caitiff knights before Guinevere arrived. Try as they would to live up to her, there was nothing much left to do. So Guinevere was disappointed in her lover as she had been in her husband, and rubbed it in even harder on Lancelot than she did on Arthur, who, after all, was a King as well as a husband, and could not prudently be pushed too far. And then Galahad came to court.

Galahad, as strong as Lancelot, but fresh from the country, mentally dough that could be baked in a pan of any shape, was a godsend to Guinevere. In the first place, by forming his character she could infuriate his mother, whom she hated; she could visit infinite annoyance on Lancelot, whom after all these years she hated quite as much as she loved him; she could make Galahad her son in the spirit, the only man in the country who was strong enough to come reasonably near carrying out Guinevere's lofty if vague ideals, and simple enough to try. He believed that right was right and wrong was wrong, and he had "no curiosity whatever"; and when he discovered that nobody, not even Guinevere herself, lived up to the ideals she had implanted in him, he felt that the trouble must be with the human race, not with the ideals.

Because no earthly objective was worthy of the holy fervor with which Guinevere had inspired him (he lived too early to undertake the strict enforcement of the Volstead act), he went off Grail-chasing; and here the story ends. It is unfair to quarrel with an author over what he chooses not to write, but one cannot help regretting that Mr. Erskine omitted so much of the raw material of Arthurian legend. Practically, he confines himself to the single theme of what two disagreeable women could make out of a stupid boy (and out of his well intentioned father, for Lancelot as much as Galahad was victimized by Elaine and Guinevere) and this is not a very merry topic. Neither was the baneful history of the Atridae, out of which Dr. Erskine drew so much comedy; but the comedy of "The Private Life of Helen of Troy" was in the main the comedy of unexpectedness and incongruity, the incongruity between the inexorable movement of inconsiderate life and the glittering loftiness of human theory; the essential comedy of this somewhat grotesque universe. In the theme of "Galahad" there is less movement, less drama, and accordingly less material for laughter.

Helen, with all her faults, was an engaging woman; one can see how Menelaus could never quite get her out of his system. But Erskine's Guinevere, on the whole, is less admirable than Cabell's Guinevere; for though neither Jurgen nor his creator seems to have thought very well of that lady, she undeniably gave the gentlemen pleasure, which is more than can be said of Guinevere as Mr. Erskine sees her. Whoever enjoyed her favors, licit or otherwise, paid for them with compound interest. One misses in this book, too, the rule-of-thumb common-sense of Etsoneus, Menelaus's doorkeeper: the nearest approach to him is Lancelot's cousin, Sir Bors, a practical person who appears all too infrequently.

Mr. Erskine has managed to make more than most people, however, out of Arthur; not so much as he made out of Menelaus, perhaps, but then Menelaus was Everyhusband—every husband, at any rate, of a fascinating woman. Also the stories of Troy undoubtedly preserve a good deal more of historic fact than the Arthurian legend. One cannot help wondering what that dimly remembered "dux Bretannorum," who was the historic Arthur—a tough person he must have been to make a name for himself in those turbulent times—would say of the legend which has made him one of the famous deceived husbands of history. Tennyson, gingerly laying hold of this unsavory matter, could do no better than to make of Arthur a noble imbecile, too high minded to see what was going on under his nose.

Mr. Erskine materially improves on that. His Arthur knew about Lancelot and Guinevere all along, and condoned the liaison for reasons which, when he finally told them to Lancelot, drove that conscience-stricken gentleman to a monastery without further delay. Menelaus understood Helen and put up with her because with all her faults she had something unique which Menelaus wanted and could get nowhere else. Arthur understood Guinevere, too; and toward the end of their married life he observed to her, "I've never liked the theory that women should inspire men to great deeds, but I couldn't see what was wrong with it. Now I do. If the women want to inspire anybody to work they should inspire each other."

If this happy discovery had been made in time, the goodly fellowship of the Round Table might never have been broken up and Guinevere might have found a useful outlet for her talents by becoming the Alice Paul of the realm. But one doubts if that, or anything, would have satisfied Guinevere.

John Erskine.

G. B. Stern Follows the Fortunes of the Rakonitz Clan

A DEPUTY WAS KING. By G. B. Stern. 419 pp. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.

OLD-TIME travelere in China in daye when the Celestial Empire was really celestial and its people had all the time there was, used to tell of strange tragedies performed at Pekingese or Cantonese theatres, in which murder and suicide disposed of the entire dramatis personae in one night, leaving the plot to be resumed the following evening with the ghosts of the cast as its leading men and women. Our contemporary novelists have not yet gone to that length. But no one can contemplate current fiction in England and France without noticing a new penchant for novels on a serial scale. Not only are sequels written, but series are projected to run to five and ten volumes, and readers are advised that the finis written on the ultimate page of any one volume is not to be taken seriously. In other words, the discovery has been made that the public will stand for a method that makes the author's task considerably easier and due advantage is being taken of it.

Sometimes, as with Miss Stern's "A Deputy Was King," the advantage seems to be an undue one, and to lay snares for the author that not only reduce the strain upon his or her imagination, but reduce the value of the result as a work of art. Your modern author is Balzacian or nothing. But to follow Balzac's lead without possessing the turmoil of creation that makes him one of our literary portents, is to risk disaster. "The Matriarch" was a sterling piece of work—a highly original and detailed study of racial temperament through several generations and in several countries. But its great merit as a work of art, namely, that it carried the Rakonitz diaspora to its logical disappearance in alien stocks, becomes a very great failing when an attempt is made to resume the story and to carry it on through a novel of the portentous length of close on to 100,000 words. So vigorously have the Rakonitz and Czelovar family trees proliferated, so many new grafts have they received, that there are times in Miss Stern's sequel when we not only cannot see the woods for the trees, but lose sight of the trunks among the leaves. Relatives from far quarters of the earth still foregather, with outlandish names and strange accents, not omitting the neo-Celtic of the Irish literary movement. But in the general amalgam their significance disappears. The strange hierarchy of extravagant women and overtasked men which made "The Matriarch" so fascinating a racial document is broken up and largely melted down. Reminiscent fragments of it still protrude from the molten mass. The old matriarch, dying amid her hotch-potch of trash and treasure like some frowsy old lioness, is with us half way through the book. When she is gone little is left except an ill-disciplined stage crowded with characters who make spasmodic efforts one after another to convince us of their reality—a series of tortuous, incredible and terribly overwritten psychologies.

Toni Rakonitz, the brave "young matriarch" whom we left at the end of Miss Stern's earlier novel wrestling with a load of debt and needy relatives, is, more than any one else, the heroine of its successor. When we meet her she has achieved relative success in a Hanover Street atelier, but is tiring of hard work and mean living and is in a mood to be reputably supported. The younger son of a rich county family, Giles Goddard, offers himself and is taken without much enthusiasm. The habit among English novelists of blaming the war—in the four years of which "youth was robbed"—for all kinks in the character of men between 25 and 35 shows no signs of abating. By Miss Stern it is offered in full explanation for four or five years of dancing, drinking and theatregoing, during which the Hanover Street enterprise becomes a trouble-some liability to be kept afloat with overdrafts and notes of hand.

The gay menage goes to pieces, not on a return to common sense but through a vagrant little cousin, who claims Rakonits kin at a dance and whose place in the family tree is carefully plotted out for us. With Loraine, the attempt is made, so popular just now among a certain school of English noveHsts, to create an entirely synthetic and futurist psychology and to avoid accounting for her by the simple resource of making her essentially unaccountable and a liar to boot.

Her ancestors were of every known European nation, with a wayward dash in the direction of the South Seas. • • • She had had three adoring husbands. • • • She was an international vamp and the Portuguese police would like to trace her whereabouts. She had apparently a glorious gift for singing. • • • She had the finest seat to hounds of any woman in County Wicklow. • • • She had a palate for Madeira and port, and there wasn't a cabin nor hovel on the west coast of Ireland, nor an arena in the length and breadth of Andalusia, that didn't know her and love her.

Loraine's reasons for running away with Giles to Italy and leaving Toni to what consolation dressmaking in Mayfair still offers are in character.

How dared you leave Toni. • • • I'll never forgive you for leaving Toni, for me or any one else. • • • Need you have come? I had no man belonging to me. • • • We who are the lone pirates dash in anywhere to make a capture. Can't you resist a temptation? Am I trustee of your faithfulness?

Poor Giles, whose lungs, after gas in Flanders, are as weak as his will, ends the argument with a hemorrhage.

From a novel that for long stretches turns into such a farrago of allueiveness and cataract of small beer that the critic of The London Times rather significantly warns us "it demands absorbed reading," it is a pleasure to turn back to the one character whom her creator in a more inspired moment literally gave the three dimensions of creative art. The brave old matriarch is dying, at 86, in a cheap suburban house, vulgar, "broncanteuse," but game to the last:

When 7 o'clock came round and the phantom tortoise-shell comb did not, could not materialise, the Matriarch scolded, clamored, and threw herself about on the bed, still littered with sardine tins and old satin corsets and the pink and gilt writing set; she issued a hectic confusion of orders in every direction, she cursed Suzie's mother richly and profusely in every language; • • • finally, choking out something inarticulate about a Chinese cloisonné vase which poor Louis had never liked and a bad deal in Nong-Khan sapphires, she burst a small blood vessel in her head and lay quiet at last. • • •

Well Dressed — Well Bred Yet They're Rank Outsiders!

This Valuable FREE BOOKLET Tells Why!

OF course they are well-groomed! And they know every rule of etiquette! Yet somehow or other they always feel out of place in the society of cultivated people.

They sense a certain awkwardness—a certain uncomfortable feeling of inferiority in their own speech and actions. They seem slighted, ignored, politely belittled on every social occasion. In a word, they "don't belong"—they are rank outsiders. Yet they hardly realize what it is that betrays them.

So many of us unwittingly develop failings that "label" us as uncultured. So many of us make tell-tale blunders in the presence of highly cultivated people. So many of us forget that etiquette is merely the expression of culture—only the outward manifestation of a desire to appear well-bred!

Are you absolutely sure of yourself? Are you confident that you could hold your own in any cultured group? Or would you feel a little ill at ease, somewhat afraid to express yourself, vaguely doubtful of your ability to discuss intelligently art, music, literature, and all the worthwhile interests of intelligent people?

Avoid Being Misjudged!

You are well bred. And yet—is your voice as pleasing as you would like it to be? Does your manner always impress people and win their admiration? Do you invariably feel "at home" under any circumstance—in any company?

No matter how well dressed you may be, no matter how thoroughly versed in the rules of etiquette, you can still be considered uncultured—still remain a rank outsider. For dress is merely one expression of the great art of culture—and etiquette is but a surface indication of culture—often actually used to hide a lack of refinement.

The truly cultured person must be not only well-dressed but well-spoken; not only comfortable but gracious; not only at ease himself but able to place everyone else at ease. He instantly commands a wealth of personal charm, a limitless fund of poise and assurance, a fine cultural background that draws friends to him like a magnet—irresistibly!

And now you, too, can give yourself a complete cultural training. You can learn how to overcome timidity—how to be at ease in any company—how to develop social charm—how to broaden your interests—how to show culture in speech and action—how to develop a fascinating personality—how to win influential friends. You can actually make culture "second nature" to you!

Let This Free Booklet Guide You!

We shall be very glad indeed to tell you more about this fascinating subject—more about culture and what it can mean to you—more about the unique Science of Culture that well bred people everywhere are discussing.

Let us send you at once, without the slightest cost or obligation to you, a copy of the illustrated booklet "The Development of Culture." Wanamaker Made Partners of Business and Religion

Herbert Adams Gibbons Writes a Two-Volume Biography of the Great Merchant

JOHN WANAMAKER. By Herbert Adams Gibbons. Two volumes. 868 pp. New York: Harper & Bros. $10.

By EVANS CLARK

The world is so full of a number of things
I am sure we should all be as happy as kings.

THAT these familiar lines of Stevenson's were among John Wanamaker's favorites to the end of his life is not surprising. Throughout the fourscore and four years of his crowded existence John Wanamaker was essentially the child. He played, of course, with incredibly big and complicated toys—his stores were the largest of their kind in the world, he probably founded more churches and missions and schools than any other layman in history, the organizations and committees he belonged to were legion, and for a while he had the postoffices of the nation under his charge. But the size and complexity did not alter the essential fact that to him all these were toys and that he was always at play.

John Wanamaker had great "fun" out of life—the word occurs again and again in his writings. It was a "great adventure" for him—like leading a band of playmates in an Indian war. He was serious, of course—children are the most serious people in the world. He was deeply religious, loyal, idealistic, enthusiastic, sentimental. Never, apparently, did he achieve that detachment, that critical, analytic, appraising objectiveness which is the hallmark of maturity.

His whole being was expressed in terms of action, as a child's is. He was completely identified with what he was doing. Rest he detested. Leisure to him was only a chance to do something else—like the boy come home from school. It was not that he did not think. His mind was prodigiously active, but as a child's—with what he is going to do next and how it is to be done. He was continually tearing down what he had built and putting up something bigger and better in its place. But thought for its own sake, for the pure pleasure of thinking or even for the serious business of digging out the inwards of things, was completely foreign to his nature.

This childlike quality of Mr. Wanamaker's was his charm and his strength; everybody liked him; he had the magnetic quality of youth, and no serious doubts of himself or the essential goodness and friendliness of life ever interjected themselves between him and what he wanted to do. But it was also his greatest weakness. He was extremely irritating to intellectual and sensitive persons who care more for perspective than they do for bulk, who respond to richness and color more completely than they do to length and breadth. He could put together and keep running one of the most gigantic conglomerations of people and things that a single man has ever devised—he employed 50,000 people, and his stores were worth hundreds of millions, and he could revolutionize the retail store methods of a nation; but his artistic taste was naïve, to say the least, and, in spite of the fact that he wrote some 5,000 editorials and countless pages of advertising matter, he did not add one line to the nation's literature.

If it be a virtue for a biography not only to record the facts of a man's life, but to do so with precisely the same methods, in the same manner and spirit as those of the person with whom it deals, then Dr. Gibbons's life of Wanamaker is a model for the ages. Dr. Gibbons has written precisely the kind of biography which Mr. Wanamaker would have written about himself.

It is of prodigious size, two volumes of meticulous but often irrelevant and repetitious detail. As a catalogue of Mr. Wanamaker's achievements it has all the force—and the thinness—of the best sort of advertising copy. It catalogues in simple, vivid and often quite compelling style the goods that are for sale. It is not given to overstatement—and certainly not to understatement. It lacks completely every hint of criticism or analysis, except as these may make merit the more convincing. It is too journalistic, too sprightly to be dull; yet it has the same essential flatness that characterized Mr. Wanamaker's advertising sermons. For those who are interested in what Mr. Wanamaker did, Dr. Gibbons has spread out an eloquent and arresting record; but for those who want to know what Mr. Wanamaker was, he has contributed—considering the size of the offering—singularly little.

Dr. Gibbons hangs before the reader a gallery of cleverly etched vignettes: John Wanamaker, the pallid but persistent salesman who joined the church at 18, did missionary work among the customers of his employer's clothing store and taught Sunday school on week-ends; John Wanamaker, the first full-time Y. M. C. A. Secretary in the country, organizing welfare work on a business basis; John Wanamaker turning down the ministry as a career because he "could do more good" as a merchant; John Wanamaker, the young clothing store proprietor, climbing rapidly to success by making uniforms for the Grand Army of the Republic and combining Christian principles of "service to the public" with a genius for display and an amazing facility for speaking a language the people could understand.

The book reveals an astonishing partnership in Mr. Wanamaker's life between business and religion, which apparently retained at least the most effective features of both. We see Mr. Wanamaker helping to bring the multitude to a Moody and Sankey revival in the same building that he later turned into a bigger and better clothing house; we see him serving the public by giving lavishly of his time and effort to the great Centennial of 1876, and opening "a new kind of store" as an annex to the exhibition; we see him organizing a new kind of Sunday school, with leading Philadelphians on the board, and so on from one spectacular—always spectacular—achievement to another, the sacred and the secular, service and success, going hand in hand, to the greater glory of each.

Dr. Gibbons spreads out a panorama of incredible human activity. Mr. Wanamaker, not content with establishing three large retail stores in Philadelphia—one of them the largest in the world, a wholesale dry goods business of $20,000,000 a year—a great Sunday school plant and a printing and publishing house, began to take an active interest in politics in the late '80s. He contributed heavily both in time and dollars to the largest campaign fund ever raised up to that time—in support of Benjamin Harrison for President. And when Mr. Harrison was elected, Wanamaker became Postmaster General.

Just as he had established a new kind of store and a new kind of Sunday school, Mr. Wanamaker tried his best to build up a new kind of postoffice. Postal savings, parcels post, pneumatic tubes, steamship mail subsidies were reforms he either advocated first or actually established, and he fought manfully for Government ownership of telegraph and telephone lines. Less successful, but no less earnest, were his attempts to clean out the corruption in Pennsylvania politics.

His later years saw the conquest of New York: the triumph of a newcomer in the already crowded field of metropolitan department stores. Sandwiched in among all his other activities were frequent trips to Europe, enlivened by a growing public recognition that led in his later years into more than one royal court. An interest in Masonry also captured his enthusiasm well along in life, and carried him in a few short years to the exalted height of thirty-three degrees. His devotion to the cause of industrial education took concrete form—in the Wanamaker Institute Industries as well as active membership on several educational boards.

Dr. Gibbons tells a stirring tale of Mr. Wanamaker and the panic of 1907, when he "rode the storm" because he "was always on the bridge of the ship." Wanamaker had the strange experience of "being worth millions and yet finding himself unable to get money out of the banks or on Government bonds." In spite of ugly and repeated rumors that he had gone to the wall, he saw through the crisis without even a mortgage on a building—to the end he kept his enormous plant completely free of debt.

The reader of Dr. Gibbons's book is carried along on a swirling stream of narrative at an almost breathless pace. There is very little pause for contemplation. Occasionally the author peers into the flow of Mr. Wanamaker's inexhaustible activity to see the personality below. But the glimpses are far too fleeting for real intimacy. One gets a definite impression of certain obvious traits, but they are left unexplained, their roots undisturbed by the author's light and swiftly moving touch.

And yet Mr. Wanamaker's personality was of absorbing interest, one that temptingly invites the probe. Had he even made use of Mr. Wanamaker's failure to grow up Dr. Gibbons might have pulled together into an understandable pattern a great many seemingly unrelated strands of character. Many of Mr. Wanamaker's critics, for example, thought him hypocritical; sermonizing sentimentality did not seem to fit the character of a merchant prince. But all Dr. Gibbons does with this criticism is to defend Mr. Wanamaker by asserting that he really was sincere—which, of course, convinces no one.

The anomaly of Mr. Wanamaker as the hard-headed business man and the Sunday school leader at the same time is puzzling only on the assumption of an inner maturity which he never attained. His faith was so childlike, his work was so much like play in its simple directness, even when most complex, that the two never came into conflict. As the phantasies of the child color his play and his play confirms and nourishes his phantasies, so Mr. Wanamaker's religion was a powerful help to him in his business and his business an ever-present aid in the practice of his religion.

But a mere exposition of Mr. Wanamaker's childishness and its effects does not, of course, uncover the reason for his immaturity. Only an intimate study of his early life would reveal it, and for this Dr. Gibbons apparently has seen no need. Certain chance phrases here and there, however, raise the issue in other terms.

"Mr. Wanamaker," writes Dr. Gibbons, "was too dependent on human contacts to be happy where there were not many people and much hustle." And again: "A painting, a book, a religious exposition had either to tell a story that attracted or inspired, or at least to put a glamour on life and take one out of one's self." "Pollyanna" Mr. Wanamaker adored—"the word is not too strong"—and he used to watch the sale of it with eagerness, "getting reports from both bookstores on it." An intimate friend of his once remarked: "Mr. Wanamaker reads to rest and amuse himself." Dr. Gibbons adds that "in none of his voluminous writings did Mr. Wanamaker attempt to indulge in self-analysis."

One suddenly gets a picture of a person in continual fear lest he look deep into the well of his own personality, lest he see the crudeness of things at the core. The picture is undoubtedly too simple, but Mr. Wanamaker's whole life all at once seems to resolve itself, like that of many another man of large affairs, into a prodigious effort to get away from himself.

Man's Evolution in Fictional Form

HEIR OF ALL THE AGES. The Family Tree of Mr. Smith. By N. K. McKechnie. 300 pp. Indianapolis: The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.50.

MR. McKECHNIE has chosen to spread the gospel of evolution by a method that is unique, ingenious and interesting. He starts at the present time with a commonplace man, the representative of a million others, whom he names Hamilton Smith, and proceeds to read his family tree backward through generations and centuries and eons to the very beginnings of life on this earth. 'Glimpsing first one ancestor in an episode of his life and then another further back at some crucial moment, he makes the whole series of stories dramatic, a succession of graphic tales skillfully told joined together on the thread of Hamilton Smith's ancestry. First comes an incident in London in 1801 when Wat the Wagoner has his watchman's shelter upset by a roistering gang; then, skipping back to the year 1381, the author tells how one of the Smith forebears took part in the Peasants' Revolt; then further back, to the Saxon invasion, then to the days of the Celts, and the pre-Celtic times, back and back to the glacial period, to the ape-like creatures who lived in trees, millions of generations further back to a tiny opossum-like creature, then to a graceful lizard, then millions of years further back to the time when all life was confined to the sea. And all through the series of tales he makes it evident that progress, development, evolution have been dependent in every case upon struggle with circumstances.

Over a stretch of caking ground between two softer pools we see in the murky light two mud-covered objects scuffling, a fish, or what looks like a fish, in earnest pursuit of a soft-shelled crustacean. * * * Were you annoyed the other day, Hamilton, when some one remarked that you were a "poor fish"? You need not be. If either you or your traducer showed a tithe of the energy and determination in battling the difficulties of life in your day that this fish-ancestor showed in his you might well be proud of yourselves.

Mr. McKechnie keeps the structure of all his stories, their backgrounds and his interspersed comments true to scientific findings, although, of course, the dramatic drapery and character presentation are the result of a fertile and vivid imagination.

By PERCY A. HUTCHISON

SELDOM may one pick up several books of modern American verse and find in them so much of excellent poetry as is to be found in these volumes. To be sure, all of the names are well known and poor work was not to be expected of any of the writers, but the real achievement of the several poets is made the more impressive by the accident of mass. The quality of their work speaks well for what America is doing today in poetry.

So much has been written of the exquisite refinement of Sara Teasdale's lyric poetry that there is nothing new to be added; the most that is possible is to restate the already known and to call attention to this refinement in the latest specimens of the poet's art. There is, no doubt, some significance to the title Sara Teasdale has chosen for her volume. The author has taken to heart the admonition of Browning's "Rabbi Ben Ezra,"

Grow old along with me,
The best is yet to be,

and with serenity looks upon life as it blurrs from garish day to night—to night when the moon is on the wane. The poems are in pensive mood, but they are not melancholy. And they are noble with the nobility of "Urn Burial" and the Book of Ecclesiastes. There is nothing of fear; there is nothing, even, of pessimism. In this last, perhaps Sara Teasdale would not be called modern. But neither is there that optimism which annoys with blatancy. Serene peace is the note struck; and seldom in English poetry has it been struck with at once so much of solemnity and so much lightness. The artistic balance of these two moods in such a poem as the double-quatrain "Epitaph" shows how near Sara Teasdale can come to art's ultimate goals.

Serene descent, as a red leaf's descending
When there is neither wind nor noise of rain,
But only Autumn air and the unending
Drawing of all things to the earth again:

So be it; let the snow sift deep and cover
All that was drunken once with light and air;
The earth will not regret her tireless lover,
Nor he awake to know she does not care.

Since lyric poetry is the last refinement of expression made the vehicle for the last refinement of thought and mood, it is natural that poetry ever should be half in love with easeful death, and as no one knows what it is to die until it is too late to make either a utilitarian or an artistic use of the knowledge, it is impossible to place any check on the poet's imagining. One will approach the subject with resignation. And it would be safe to say that the modern poet will generally be found engaged on the double task of proclaiming that there is beauty in death, and of reconciling the living to the thought of death; there will be an absence both of philosophy and religion. Sara Teasdale's "Epitaph" can but impress one as discharging this double duty with a delicacy scarcely to be exceeded.

In "Beautiful, Proud Sea"—also a double-quatrain—Sara Teasdale may or may not be open to criticism for the poetic fallacy by which intelligence is granted to the sea. We fancy that Joseph Conrad, for one, would be unmoved by her apostrophe. But this forgiven, the lyric will be seen as a thing of singular beauty, especially in the last two lines, in which the poet once again comes back to the color (if color it may be called) for which she has shown such partiality in her poetry of the past. Reference is to her use of silver, with its gleaming austerity.

Careless forever, beautiful, proud sea,
You laugh in happy thunder all alone,
You fold upon yourself, you dance your dance
Impartially on drift-weed, sand and stone.

You make us believe that we can outlive death,
You make us for an instant, for your sake,
Burn, like stretched silver of a wave,
Not breaking, but about to break.

The poetry of Sara Teasdale is not colorful poetry any more than it is emotional poetry. Her feeling for silver is, perhaps, significant. What we have called the gleaming austerity of the metal might without hyperbole be extended to characterize her art. To many, no doubt, this will seem synonymous with calling it cold. But Sara Teasdale's poetry is not cold; it is merely that she has brought her art to such a degree of refinement that her poetry takes on the air of exclusiveness. For those who have attained the corresponding refinement of taste, "Dark of the Moon" holds many poems greatly to be prized.

In "Flying Fish" Mrs. Conkling, with her more debonair touch, offers to "Dark of the Moon" a happy contrast. Not that Mrs. Conkling cannot be grave. In a sequence of twelve sonnets she will be found both grave and profound. But she also can be gay, with a whimsical gayety that exercises a potent charm. As an instance of this there is her poem "The Snail."

The snail is very old and slow,
He has his mind made up to go
And will not let you steer him there.
Today I met one in the grass
And hadn't time to watch him pass,
But coming back at sunset, I
Discovered him still traveling by.
The grass-blades grew so thick and tall
I asked him why he climbed them all,
And told him I had sometimes found
The shortest way was going 'round,
He was not easy to persuade,
To judge by any sign he made,
And when I lectured him some more
Went in his house and shut the door.

Likewise in contrast to the poetry of Sara Teasdale, the poetry of Mrs. Conkling abounds in color. Her work is not to be placed beside that of Sara Teasdale, but, on the other hand, it will be found impinging on life at more points. The author of "Flying Fish" is a poetic rover, and too frequently she is willing to substitute poetic roving for communion with her soul. But she had done many beautiful bits of verse, and not a few of them will be found in the present volume.

Seldom does one come on a more engaging poet than Orrick Johns proves himself to be. Not a voluminous writer, in the few lyrics which he has allowed to get into print from time to time, Mr. Johns has shown himself to be not without genius. There is something impish here and there in his verse, an artistic impishness, that is; and it is not the least of his poetry's charms. Mr. Johns can turn out lines that compare, if not with the best in poetry, at least with what is next to the best. But it is as if he feared being mistaken for a poet, and, to prove that he is not, turns at the critical moment, with the jolliest kind of a smile, to prose, or to prosy things. To take for an instance of this the lyric called "The Last Night."

Hadn't we better rise and go
Down to the wood so ashen-white?
And you will give me a kiss, I know,
Since this is our last night.

I will give you a kiss indeed,
A kiss for this and a kiss for that!
And maybe a kiss to fit your need—but this is becoming dangerous, very dangerous, and Mr. Johns knows it. Too many kisses will ruin the best-intentioned poem. And with deftness he makes his escape.

So go and get your hat.

The lilt so strikingly present in the lines quoted will be found in most of the poems in "Wild Plum." Orrick Johns, without in any way appearing consciously to imitate the old ballads, seems to have made their peculiar musical quality his own. In this he suggests Miss Edna Millay. Mr. Johns may now be counted with Miss Millay in the crusade to bring back to American poetry the musical quality so many have sought to banish. How many among the latter Americans could, for example, have written Mr. Johns's "The Healands"?

Two Intellectual Victims of the Wanderlust

JESTING PILATE: An Intellectual Holiday. By Aldous Huxley. 326 pp. New York: The George H. Doran Company. $3.50.

ROUNDABOUT TO CANTERBURY. By Charles S. Brooks. 346 pp. New York: Harcourt, Brace & Co. $3.

THE foreign scene may be taken in either through the mind or the eye. Of course, both means of receptivity merge to a certain degree, in that it is impossible for the mind to revolve about an alien atmosphere with all its implications without first receiving the guiding marks of that atmosphere through the eye. A chance gesture, the arrangement of components, a word spoken, a sufficiency of kindred urges, anything at all, in fact, will—taken through the eye—afford the mind meat upon which to fasten. Mr. Aldous Huxley in "Jesting Pilate: An Intellectual Holiday," takes an entire strip girdling the earth for his particular portion, and the result is a book that is as fully reflective of the author's mind as it is of India, Burma, Malaya, China, the Pacific and America. Any book concerned with travel is, of course, a personal matter. It is mainly the reactions of an individual against environments that are strange. But it is not often that these reactions become so personal, so unique, so much a matter of individual conclusions as they are, for instance, in "Jesting Pilate." The secret to the subject matter in this book is implied in the subtitle to it, "An Intellectual Holiday." By this, it is patent, Mr. Huxley does not mean that his intellect went to sleep or deserted the job for a few months. He merely means that his intellect went on a journey through foreign lands. This must be so, for it is apparent that this much-mentioned intellect did not cease to function with a high degree of rapidity throughout those curious wanderings. The Far East, with all its glamour, its color, its elephants and anklet-jangling women, might well have been a sedative to the mind, putting busy thought to sleep and stirring only a visual curiosity. But Mr. Huxley functions in all weathers and scenes. He brings to bear a certain super-refined and excessively sophisticated mind on the immediate scene, and because of this he is never to be found following the majority in his reactions to scenes and peoples. For instance, a thousand and one travelers have raved about the Taj Mahal, bursting into lyrical Paterian purple passages of prose about that building set so beautifully among its trees above the crystal-clear pool. Mr. Huxley, on the contrary, does not like it at all. It was a disappointment to him. "Its elegance," he declares, "is at the best of a very dry and negative kind. Its 'classicism' is the product not of intellectual restraint imposed on an exuberant fancy, but of an actual deficiency of fancy, a poverty of imagination." Many a school teacher, fresh from the wonders of Mr. Thomas Cook's personally conducted tours through the highways and byways of the world, will wince at this attempted destruction of one of her fondest illusions. The reason for Mr. Huxley's failure to convince her is in itself an epitome of "Jesting Pilate." His book, by and large, is an implicit demand for intellectual restraint. It is also a study, not profound or unified, of course, of the mentality of humanity. One must not look for a coherent and rounded development, but, at the same time, one will find the fairly consistent reflections of an intellectualized viewpoint.

When Mr. Huxley went through India, gazing at old temples, listening to Hindoo music, meditating upon camels and elephants and bazaars and beggars, he went as somewhat of an intellectual rebel from his own sphere. He is what we might denominate as one of the "sophisticates," but he is a sophisticate of a far higher order than the sort known in this country as the "wise-cracker." He does not skate across the surface of life, although the surface with all its humors is quite plain to him. He makes, instead, a sturdy attempt to dig below the surface, to reach those deeper urges that make up the individuality of a people, and if he fails at times it is only because of lack of time and intimacy. His India, for instance, is not the India of E. M. Forster. Still, it is to be expected that Mr. Forster would read "Jesting Pilate" with a lively degree of pleasure in many of the points indicated. Mr. Huxley describes with brevity and then reasons, for the most part with a becoming variousness, about what he has seen. The fluctuations of the mind, the reasons for its development and the curious phenomena of the slave instinct engross him. When he comes to America, for instance, he notes that "now that liberty is out of date, equality an exploded notion and fraternity a proven impossibility, republics should

"Jog On, Jehosophat"

DR. STUART CLOSE, Brooklyn, N. Y.—J. B., in your issue of Oct. 24, asks where the poem "Jog On Jehosophat," can be found. I inclose a copy of a reprint of the poem clipped by me from some publication, the name of which I did not note and have forgotten.

JOG ON, JEHOSOPHAT.

Road gets rougher every mile;
(Cluck) Jog on, Jehosophat, an' show some style.
Mule's gone lame, an' the hens won't lay;
Corn's way down, an' wheat don't pay;
Hogs no better, steers too cheap,
Cows quit milking, meat won't keep,
Oats all heated, spuds all frose;
Fruit crop's busted, wind still blows;
Sheep seem puny, and I'll be durned,
Rye field's flooded and the haystack burned.
Looks some gloomy, I'll admit—
(Cluck) Jog on, Jehosophat, we ain't down yit.
Wheels all wobble; axle's bent;
Dashboard's broken; top all rent;
One shaft splintered; t'other sags;
Seat's all busted; end gate drags;
May hang together—b'lieve it will;
Careful drivin'll make it still;
Roads some better, not so rough—
Trot! Gosh ding ye! That's the stuff!
Old trap's movin' right good speed—
(Cluck) Jog on, Jehosophat, you're some steed.
Road's smoothed out 'till it don't seem true
(Cluck) Jog on, Jehosophat, you pulled us through.

Queries and Answers

"Inspiration," and consists of twenty verses, the sixth being the one partly quoted by E. P. C., which is given correctly below:

I hearing get, who had but ears:
And sight, who had but eyes be, fore;
I moments live, who lived but years.
And truth discern, who knew but learning's lore.

Elbert Prettyisaf, Lewistown, Pa., also answered this request.

"The Prisoner"

MISS FLORENCE A. COOK, Albany, N. Y.—In answer to F. R.'s query of Oct. 17, the play, "The Prisoner," was taken from "Ball of Suel," by Guy de Maupassant.

"A Road Song"

MISS HELEN V. HERZOG, Bethlehem, Pa.—In reply to M. L. B.'s query in your issue of Oct. 24, I enclose the entire poem, "A Road Song," as copied from a popular magazine a dozen years ago. I am sorry that I do not know the author's name.

A ROAD SONG.

These to be thankful for; a friend,
A work to do, a way to wend,
And these in which to take delight:
The wind that turns the poplars white.
Wonder and gleam old common things,
Sunlight upon a sea gull's wings,
Odors of earth, and dew drenched lawns,
The pageantry of darks and dawns,
Blue vistas of a city street at twilight;
Music, passing feet,
The thrill of Spring, half joy, half pain,
The deep voice of the Autumn rain.
Shall we not be content with these,
Imperishable mysteries?
And jocund hearted take our share
Of joy and pain and find life fair?
Wayfarers in a road where we Set forth each day right valiantly,
Expectant, dauntless, blithe, content,
To make this great experiment.

M. J. Donnelly, Brooklyn, N. Y., also contributed the poem. A copy has been sent to our correspondent.

"Father, I'm Afraid"

REV. ARNOLD S. YANTIS, Rutland, Vt.—I am pleased to send a copy of the poem wanted by W. W. A. in your issue of Oct. 24. The first stanza follows:

FATHER, GO WITH ME.
By N. B. Turner.

Sent to bed in the dark alone,
Where all the corners were weird and dim
And the shapes and the shadows waited him
At every turning—My little son,
Sent for some childish mischief done
At the hour when childish hearts are high
With joy of the evening's revelry—
And his fault at worst was a tiny one.

Space will not permit the publication of the remaining three stanzas.

A copy of the complete poem has been sent to our correspondent.

"Jerusalem"

MISS HELIEN FULLER, Nashville, Tenn.—The poem by Frank D. Budiong entitled "The Destruction of Jerusalem," for which C. A. S. asks in your issue of Oct. 24 may be found in H. A. Frink's "New Century Speaker," published by Ginn & Co., New York. I am sorry I have not a copy of it to send.

"They Who Have Had the Night"

L. UNDERHILL, Brooklyn, N. Y.—The lines quoted, not quite correctly, by B. C. A. in your issue of Oct. 24, are from the preludo to Algernon Swinburne's "Tristram of Lyonesse." I refer to Harper's edition of Swinburne (Vol. IV, page 13). They run:

They have the night, who had like us the day;
We, whom day binds, shall have the night as they.
We, from the fetters of the light unbound,
Healed of our wound of living, shall sleep sound.

"I Am Shamed"

PATTEN BEARD, Norwalk, Conn.—In reply to J. B. B.'s query (Oct. 24), the lines:

Shall it not be scorn to me
To harp on such a moulder'd string?
I am shamed thro' all my nature
To have loved so slight a thing.

may be found in Alfred Tennyson's "Locksley Hall" (line 147).

The following readers answered this query: Cora L. Eisenberg, New York; W. H. Rogers, Tallahassee, Fla.; Sadie M. Keough, Springfield, Mass.; Mrs. A. F. Parsons Smith, New York; Mrs. L. H. Griffin, New York; Jane M. Lytle, Pittsburgh, Pa.; Mrs. George J. Wallau, Brightwater, N.

A New Book That Every Lover of Lincoln Will Want to Own

Abraham Lincoln In Peoria, Illinois

By R. C. BRYNER

Here begins the true story of Abraham Lincoln's great career. The most notable event in his political life. No history of Lincoln can ever be written without deep consideration of his Peoria speech on October 16, 1854.

FINELY printed, cloth bound, gold stamped, contains over 300 pages of intimate history and anecdote, recalling incidents never before told in print, many rare illustrations portraying scenes of life in Lincoln's day, facsimiles of Lincoln's handwriting referring to the Peoria speech and reproductions in colors of two Lincoln Historical Paintings, made especially for this book. The many exclusive features which it contains will make this a most treasured volume.

The book is built around Lincoln's visits to Peoria and his reply to Judge Douglas on October 16, 1854. This speech is now considered by the highest authorities as the foundation of all his later addresses, and the one that paved the way to the Presidency. It took over three hours to deliver and is presented in its entirety as personally edited and proof read by Mr. Lincoln himself, and it will thrill the reader today as it did the hearers in 1854. Mr. Douglas' preceding speech is also given.

Price, Post Paid in the United States, $4.50; Canada, $4.75

Send today for FREE deluxe brochure 28 pages, (6 x 9 inches), describing the book in detail and reproducing numerous illustrations and many Lincoln items not before published. Also the opinion of ten of the greatest authorities on Lincoln as to the historical value of Lincoln's Peoria speech. This free booklet will be an interesting addition to any Lincoln Collection.

Turgenev Rescued From the Gossips

Mr. Yarmolinsky's Biography Does Much to Dispel Speculation About the Novelist's Life

Turgenev in 1871. From a Drawing by Ludwig Pietsch.

TURGENEV, THE MAN: His Art and His Age.* By Avrahm Yarmolinsky. 2+386 pp., r. 8vo. Illustrated. New York: The Century Company. $4.

By HENRY JAMES FORMAN

TO have published the first comprehensive life of Turgenev in any language is no ordinary feather in the cap of American publishing. We shall see presently how nearly complete and definitive that life is. But that general readers, as well as men of letters, have long been waiting for it there is no doubt, and all of these owe a debt of gratitude to both the biographer and the publishers.

For Turgenev is one of the few truly grandiose and monumental figures of literature who has remained something of a mystery. There has been much gossip and little that was authentic. In such a caricature as Dostoyevsky's "The Possessed" we read that he, or the scarecrow Dostoyevsky created, was mean, small, effeminate and ridiculous, when he was not worse. Yet from such contemporaries as Flaubert, Goncourt, Henry James and George Moore we gather that there was something immense and godlike about the man. That not only did he shed a far-reaching influence on the nineteenth century novel, but that the man himself was a giant in spirit as well as in stature. His relations with Madame Garcia-Viardot, a subject of endless speculation, have always been obscure, and his quarrel with Tolstoy left in many minds a prejudice against him. His liberalism had never been considered first-rate, and yet he was known to have been the frind of Bakunin and of Herzen. He was a great writer with a considerable amount of work to his credit, yet the general notion of him in the minds of those who had any notion was that he was a huge idler, always hanging about Madame Viardot. It will be seen that Mr. Yarmolinsky had no simple anbject to deal with. The mere undertaking was in itself an act of prowess. To accomplish it is a signal literary victory.

However interesting may be—and are—the early years of Turgenev, the success of this section of Mr. Yarmolinsky's book inheres in the portrait he succeeded in drawing of the novelist's mother, Varvara Petrovna. It was Turgenev who had the Tartar blood in him, upon his father's side, but it was Varvara Petrovna who was the Tartar. An extraordinary combination, with something in her of the great Empress Catherine, of an eighteenth century free-spoken French Marquise, of the virago of any nation and a devilry that was wholly her own, she stands out etched with an incisiveness of which Mr. Lytton Strachey would have no cause to be ashamed. She indulged her younger son, Ivan, the subject of this biography, to the top of his bent, though she whipped him like a peasant's brat. To the prejudice of his brother, Nicholas, he was her favorite. She directed his liaisons and affairs with peasant girls and supplied him with unlimited money in his student days. She wrote him of her passionate love for him. But when he crossed her she cut him off and her death was the greatest relief to both her sons. The father, who had died earlier, seems to have counted scarcely at all. Younger than she by several years, the legend ran that he had won her hand in a game of cards, though it seems more likely she won his in that manner.

Turgenev's early education in Moscow and St. Petersburg universities was desultory enough. He was barely 15 when he entered Moscow university. But it was later in Germany that he not only drank deep of Hegelianism, but became acquainted with other Russians who lived abroad for their own good, out of the Russia of Nicholas I. It was there that he met Stankevitch and also Bakunin and Herzen, who exercised a considerable influence upon his development. Michael Bakunin, the future anarchist, was at that time only a generous-hearted student of German philosophy. Herzen, also a thirsty drinker at the fount of Kant, Fichte and Hegel, was already at war with Russia's politico-social order, a warfare he maintained to the end of his life—outside of Russia.

It was a romantic time of much conversation, love affairs and generous thinking. And always the correspondence between Ivan and his mother was going on, on her part by turns blusterous, cajoling, passionate, abusive. At times he returned home for a visit.

He engaged in occasional mild clashes with his mother on the subject of serfdom, yet, being of an unheroic temper, he sulked in his tent more often than he gave battle. He was not high-minded enough to quarrel with his bread and butter, not practical enough to earn it.

It was during one of those visits, on Nov. 1, 1843, when Turgenev was 25, that he met for the first time Pauline Garcia-Viardot, "a thin, flat-chested, slightly stooped person, with a wide full-lipped mouth, prominent features and huge, hot, black Spanish eyes." She had been singing at the Bolshoi Theatre in St. Petersburg, and Turgenev happened to be in Russia. A Belgian painter said of her, "she is atrociously homely, but should I see her again I would fall madly in love with her." Turgenev did and did. To such an extent did he fall in love with her that though she was married to her manager, Louis Viardot, she became to him mother and wife and family and mistress—yet upon a wholly platonic basis. Notwithstanding the beauty of such a relationship, when it occurs, there is something ridiculous about it—so deeply ingrained is the old Adam in us all. But Mr. Yarmolinsky, after a seemingly thorough search, can find no good evidence that the Viardot-Turgenev relationship had ever been other than platonic. The immense giant frame of Ivan Sergeivitch contained a will power too slender to detach itself, to move his heart from the first genuine lodgment, once it had found it. Turgenev exiled himself for the sake of Pauline Viardot, lived with or near the Viardots, moved where they moved, was an unfailing friend and handy man, even running errands to the chemists if a child was ill—in short, he was not merely a cavalliere sirvente, but a very serf of love.

His writing in, a measure, had to look after itself. Yet the friendship was at times exceedingly stimulating to him. Already a promising recruit to the literary circles of the Russian capital, it was between 1847 and 1850 that he wrote, in Paris, near to his Exerie, most of the pieces contained in a "Sportsman's Sketches" as well as most of his plays. The wrath of his mother and the corresponding dearth of remittances from home had something to do with this productivity. Those sketches have been said to have had a definite effect upon Alexander II's policy in freeing the serfs. But Turgenev was no Harriet Beecher Stowe, nor was his book an "Uncle Tom's Cabin." As his biographer observes:

> Aside from a desire to expose the condition or the masses, there worked in Turgenev a deeply rooted interest in simple wholehearted people. It was this as much as anything that moved him to choose the peasant as his model. Such an interest was natural to an unintegrated personality with a neurotic strain.

Whatever one may think of this conclusion—and this reviewer, for one, does not wholly embrace it—the book made of Turgenev a celebrity at home, and later he had the satisfaction of hearing from the Emperor that it was not without influence in the liberation of the serfs. Briefly, he was a non-political liberal.

The death of his mother in 1850 and the publication of the "Sketches" in book form in 1852 made a definite turning point in Turgenev's life. He was free, he was well-to-do, he was acclaimed. He was 35—and he believed himself to be a man finished, done for, upon the downward slopes of life. Throughout the balance of his life this constant haunting fear of senility, decay and death sounds like a fate note in this unusually gifted tragi-comedy of a life. He had still nearly thirty years to live, still to do his work as one of the greatest novelists of his own or any generation; much happiness yet in store in contemplation of the success and competence of the one woman he truly loved, yet like Prospero's, or Shakespeare's at Stratford, his every third thought was his grave.

When Montmartre Was French

MONTMARTRE: Past and Present.* By Emile-Bayard. *With Reminiscences by well-known artists and writers. Illustrated. New York: Brentano's. $4.50.

THIS interesting volume starts off with a retrospect of old La Butte, a region inhabited so far back as the Merovingian period. It was the scene of many an exciting conflict between invading hordes and the ancient inhabitants of Paris; but only in the comparatively modern epoch of 1878 began that series of social activities which inspired many of France's most famous men to perform their splendid work. How many inns, of charming memory, flourished, decayed and were replaced by others, on the sites of ancient churches and edifices! There was an "Auberge du Clou," frequented by a clique of young men somewhat resembling the English "dudes" of the period of Oscar Wilde in England. They called themselves "Les Symbolistes" and were wont to meet together every Thursday afternoon to discuss every topic under heaven; but chiefly, we may believe, their own performances.

In 1881 Rodolph Salis opened the famous tavern called Le Chat Noir, renting the shop that had been a postoffice and converting it into a veritable haunt of genius. There came Pierrot, the artist who made sketches for the paper bearing the same name as the tavern. It was here that Victor Hugo came to relax and Garibaldi, Zola, Jerome Napoleon and other great men sparred and ate together. The inn was called after the title of one of Edgar Allan Poe's tales, so it is said. And this indicates the esteem in which the American was held by his French contemporaries. The Chat Noir, observes the author, "was characteristic of the atmosphere of the Beaux Arts. Her muse may well be called 'L'insouciance Francaise.'" One anecdote illustrates rather racily precisely the sort of "atmosphere" which was the breath of this happy region

Jules Jouy, the song writer, was giving a dinner in the cook shop in Montmartre, when from some sudden caprice the roysterers rushed out into the street ringing bells, armed with casques, arabesques, two-handled swords and with their standard unfurled, singing the famous chant of Seraphim. They were at once set on by the police, a terrific fight took place around the flag, which was taken, and Pierrot, the unfortunate standard bearer, was captured and thrust into a dark cell. Bohemianism defying authority! An artist of genius incarcerated! Here was a crown of glory for Montmartre!

A decidedly Gallic touch which our modern youth should appreciate. It is difficult, but not impossible, to outdo a Frenchman in gayety. Politics were not left out of the inn conversations, and, although music was confined to the works of Gounod and Wagner and Massenet, the circle of performers was a large one. But conflicts of a fiercer order than political discussions burst into The Chat Noir, which became a veritable war in 1907 when M. André Salmon insisted that cubism did not originate in Germany, and the Uhlans, Uhde, Franz Essel and Lapin Agile put on the gloves in defense of a favorite theory. What remains of old Montmartre today? Not a trace. Yet the region is still fraught with the memories of a devoted attachment in the hearts of its old frequenters. In 1918 M. Maurice Haile soared into view. His first verses came out under the title "Au Pays ou qu'on parl ben." His play "La Vache Enragée" played to a small audience of about a dozen, but increased so that soon the hall was too small to contain the audience. Came the times when "Communes" rose as the slogan of the restless French, and old Montmartre was bought and sold and rebuilt under different aspects until all that was left of it was its hospitality to artists. But what a troupe of artists its ancient walls had sheltered! The writer of the Reminiscences now gives various autobiographies under the term of "Recollections," in which swarm so many names that it is not feasible to mention more than a few of them here. The Chat Noir had three distinct periods: that belonging to the date of its situation in Boulevard Rochechouart, that of the reign of the shadow plays and, finally, the period of the theatre. All are pregnant with artistic efforts upon the part of the most famous men of many epochs. Perhaps we may finish with an allusion to J. H. Rosney, historian, scientist and novelist. He says:

> I knew the old Montmartre, but only in the character of a supernumerary. I spent some amazing evenin, at the new Chat Noir. I heard Bruant sing when he was at the height of his fame, and spent many hours in l'Abbaye de Theleme. At that time Montmartre was a gay place, where art reigned as Queen and where attractive Youth held sway. Only distantly does it recall the cosmopolitan Montmartre where Americans of all types come to drink and to be fleeced.

I AM glad that I do not have to give the golden apple to one of the immortal poets of Parnassus, as Paris had to one of the immortal goddesses. For, though I recently crowned Frank ess as the leader of our youth, I uld today choose Arnold Ulitz. A ic always is highly delighted by h discoveries.

rnold Ulitz is at the end, not at beginning, of his youth; he has ady published a number of great significant novels, as well as volumes of poetry—an original y of his, "The Rash Clerk" (Der wegene Beamte), appeared in the alke" collection. But he became own to a wider circle of readers y through his last novel, "Chris- e Munk," which appeared in a and Berlin daily and now has come t in book form. Ulitz lives in Bres- , away from the literary world ere celebrities are chosen and de. ***

"Christine Munk" the author rings us to the German middle ses. Nor is this to his disad- age. For the troubles of the an soul touch our hearts more ly when it must struggle and r within the narrow confines of ary life—a life that we all know, hich we are all bound somehow ther. There are gentle flashes of humor—is not humor inseparable from everyday life? Delightful are the descriptions of the table of the prominent men in the little laborers' barroom, and of the family of the cardboard manufacturer Munk, where all the beautiful seeds that later develop into primitively luxuriant blooms in his daughter still exist unconsciously—a touching mystery. This serene, self-satisfied society is invaded by the problematic hero—a writer without creative talent, whose dramas are successful because of their revolutionary tendencies rather than because of any poetic power—a man of great ambition who, however, is unable to manage his own life or master his own destiny. He has been derailed by the war; during a riot he kills a nationalist student who had stabbed to death a poor old woman; for this he is punished with nine months of prison. But he feels that neither this deed nor its consequences have come out of his inmost soul, but are merely evil accidents. This rather morbid product of civilization is loved by a girl of perfect simplicity—a woman of the race of the great love heroines, a Juliet or a Héloise. It is glorious to see the power of her emotion raise the man above himself; to watch its volcanic outbreaks, and to notice how Christine nevertheless remains the simple middle-class girl in every one of her utterances. Although the sacrifice nearly breaks her heart, she sends her lover away for a trip around the world shortly before the wedding.

Contemporary literature contains few characters that approach the truth and inner sincerity of this Christine. The lover does not return to her. Here, again, he has not the strength to bear the narrowness of family life for the sake of love. On a beautiful South Sea island he lets himself glide down, without any exercise of his will, into the quagmire of laziness, alcohol and dull sensuality characteristic of tropical lands, where many a European has been engulfed forever. After a time in an insane asylum Christine becomes a vigorous, sober spinster. It seems that in this book the author has released himself of the torturing longing for freedom from the chains of his profession and of the commonplace; and thus he has created a marvelously resplendent figure, nourished, so to speak, with his own blood.

Odds and Ends of London's Fall Season

LONDON.

IN addition to a large output, easily classifiable under the major headings fiction, poetry, history, memoirs, travel, &c., the Fall season has been prolific in very readable books that scarcely come in any distinct category. Prominent among them is "Leaves From a Viceroy's Notebook," a miscellany of sketches and articles found by his executors among Lord Curzon's unpublished papers. They cover a wide range, from a disquisition on the origins of polo to an essay on hymns, and they bring out a side of the author's character that revealed itself in his lifetime to few besides his personal intimates. A rollicking love of fun bubbles over in some of them, which are full of good stories vivaciously told. This almost typical example of the modern grand seigneur was evidently a genial humorist, too. The Manchester Guardian makes the acute comment that the book shows Lord Curzon as more keenly interested in externals—in scenery and architecture, in the ornaments of life, in public shows and sports, in men's outward bearing—than in thought and emotion. The East is represented in many other recent publication. There is being printed an edition limited to 225 copies of A. E. Zucker's "The Chinese Theatre," a complete history of the Chinese drama from its earliest days. "O Toyo Writes Home" records the impressions of a Japanese schoolgirl in England. The Cambridge University Press has reprinted the late Professor E. G. Browne's "A Year Amongst the Persians," which fell quite flat when it appeared thirty-three years ago. Some discerning critics, nevertheless, have ranked it with "Arabic Deserta" among the classics of travel, and it is hoped that it will now come into its own. There is an Oriental flavor also about Mrs. C. E. Leyel's "The Magic of Herbs," which traces their use from legendary times, including "The Arabian Nights," to the present day.

THE Bibliophile's Almanack for 1927" is the first issue of a new annual for book collectors. They will welcome, too, the issue by the First Edition Club of a volume of reproductions of thirty bindings chosen for their artistic merit and antiquarian interest. The plates have been selected and the descriptions written by G. D. Hobson. For picture buyers there is "The Painter's Methods and Materials," by A. P. Laurie, Professor of Chemistry to the Royal Academy. It discusses such questions as "The Optical Properties of Oil," and incidentally pronounces against the belief that the Old Masters possessed secret recipes which have since been lost. Professor Laurie holds that, if their works are superior in permanency and consistency to modern works, it is because they based their art more closely on the known behavior of their materials in the conditions of painting. In "My Method," edited by Fernand A. Marteau, several living European black-and-white artists of repute tell us something of how they make their drawings. The needs of another class of collectors have called forth Alex. J. Séfi's "Introduction to Advanced Philately," an 18s. book, which treats the study of postage stamps with befitting seriousness.

If dogs could read, they would be gratified by the attention they receive nowadays in the literary world. Not long ago Katharine Tynan thought the lives of several of her canine friends worthy of commemoration in "A Dog Book," and now there have appeared an anthology of dog poems, compiled by Owen Rutter and entitled "Dog Days," and a collection of "Dog Stories From Punch," including contributions from such writers as E. V. Lucas and A. A. Milne and illustrated by George Morrow.

In the Autumn list we find also a new edition of Chambers's Biographical Dictionary; further instalments of the tenth and final volume of the Oxford Dictionary; a collection of London University lectures, edited by Dr. E. A. Baker, on "The Uses of Libraries"; "The Return to the Cabbage," being Gerald Gould's first venture in essay writing; the first volume of "Studies of the Spanish Mystics," by Professor E. Allison Peers; "The Cities of Sicily," by Edward Hutton, on the lines of his previous books on Umbria and Rome; the second volume of G. D. H. Cole's "Short History of the British Working-Class Movement"; Sir William Ashley's treatise on "Business Economics"; Lord Ernle's "The Light Reading of Our Ancestors"; T. Earle Welby's study, called "The Victorian Romantics," of the early work of Morris, Burne-Jones and their companions in various undergraduate magazines; surveys of "English Men and Manners of the Eighteenth Century," by A. S. Turberville, and of "Englishwomen in Life and Letters," by M. Phillips and W. Tomkinson; and a volume on

New Plays by Brieux And Romains

PARIS.

JULES ROMAINS is the leader, and almost the sole adherent, of the unanimous school; under such conditions it is easy to attain unanimity. Still, I am not sure that M. Jules Romains succeeds in this, for he is divided against himself. Originally a professor of philosophy, he has divided himself between a literary and a scientific career.

As a man of letters, M. Jules Romains has published a number of poems and novels, and some of them are noteworthy. But for the last few years he has been devoting himself to the drama. The plays he has had produced include, especially, "The Army in the City," "Old Cromdeyre," "Monsieur Le Trouhadec Betrayed by Debauch," "Knock," and, just now, "The Dictator." For him unanimism consists of a preference for the study of mob psychology. His Cromdeyre is a mountain village. In "Knock," which was his greatest success, he renews Molière's satires against physicians; he shows us one who operates not on a patient or two, but on the entire populace, persuading thousands of well people that they are suffering from various maladies—the advantage of this being that his services become essential, and his fortune is made.

"THE DICTATOR," which has just been presented at the Comédie des Champs-Elysées, is a political play, moderately unanimist. It is full of strikes and rebellions, but they are left behind the scenes. The story is of a Socialist leader who, after overthrowing the ministry, accepts the post of prime minister from the constitutional king; then, having attained power, he becomes a man of the Government, a conservative and a mailed-fist dictator. Similar evolutions have been observed even in republics, where revolutionary republicans also have become transformed into pillars of society. It has become an everyday occurrence. Even Sardou's Rabagas said: "I am the minister, the revolution is over." M. Jules Romains's Denis is no common intriguer, but a man of good faith who, when he presides over the council, reveals that he is responsible for the orderly streets and life of an entire nation. The subject is plausible; but M. Jules Romains has treated it in a rather summary and premeditated fashion that gives an effect of coldness to the presentation.

M. Brieux, of the French Academy, has been giving, at the Théâtre des Nouveautés, "The Lavolette Family," which would remind us a bit of Sardou's "Benoiton Family" if the social class were not different. In M. Brieux's play the father is a musical composer who has a habit of abandoning his conjugal fireside for more exciting adventures. There is no money in the house; Mme. Lavolette bravely gives piano lessons. But the son, whom no one watches properly, gets into trouble. The daughter seems better able to steer her own boat, and marries a rich young man who adores her. However, the young man's father objected to this marriage; and the girl has driven to despair a poor young man to whom she had promised her hand. Thence arise complications that almost have an unpleasant outcome, and which prove the indispensability of a father's vigilance for the family.

THE regular actors of the République have put on two felicitous revivals: "The Good-Kind Dagobert," by M. André Rivoire, which is like a Boccaccio tale put into charming, clever and entertaining verses, and Alfred de Vigny's "Chatterton," which is in prose although a great poet composed it, and which was triumphantly successful in 1835. It is a period play, but one of lasting interest.

Romanticism, the celebration of whose centenary is being prepared in France, was primarily a renaissance of poetry. Alfred de Vigny's service to it was his defense of the poets. In his book "Stello" he told of the misfortunes of three of them, Gilbert, Chatterton and André Chénier. And the second of these stories was dramatized by him. He does not approve of the suicide of this young poet whom Wordsworth calls "a marvelous boy"; but he presents it as the inevitable result of the injustice of men. Chatterton is unrecognised and starving. The Lord Mayor of London finds only a position as a valet to offer him and thinks that this is good enough for a useless fellow. Unquestionably poets should earn their living like everybody else, and since Chatterton's time (he died in 1770) this has fortunately become easier for them. But Vigny was right in his protests against the disdain shown by so many Philistines for poetry itself and for its servants. In the play there also are a good, delightful old Quaker and an adorable female character, Kitty Bell, a virtuous young mother secretly in love with Chatterton, but unable to do anything except die of grief at his death. It is exceedingly touching.

There will appear, in the near future, a new work of Maurice Maeterlinck's, "Life of the White Ant" (Le Vie des Termites) and a book by M. Henri Lavedan, "Le Veillard" (The Old Man).

Queries and Answers

This department is designed to assist in the location of complete versions of poems and their sources, the names of authors, &c., which cannot be found through the usual channels of anthologies and books of reference. THE TIMES receives a great many more queries than it can publish. It endeavors, therefore, to select those of the greatest general interest. Queries should be addressed to the Editor of Queries and Answers, NEW YORK TIMES. They should be written on one side of the paper only, and must contain the name and address of the writer as evidence of good faith.

QUERIES

"Life"

G. L. K.—Would some reader supply the poem credited to Richard Watson Gilder and entitled "Life"? I remember it forty years ago. It was short and in blank verse, I think. It began: "Said the poet to the seer, what shall I write?" The poet voices keen lament over failure and the seer advises brave buffet of the world with its injustice, hardships and trials, ending: "Eat the apple of life to the core, then sing and the world it shall listen and last." I have not seen the poem in reprint collections.

"Two by Oscar Wilde"

M. McG. R.—Would some one tell me where in Oscar Wilde's poem I may find these lines:

All her bright golden hair
Tarnished with rust,
She that was young and fair
Fallen to rust

and A. T. would like to know in which of his poems the following verses appear: "I lift my eyes to the shining stars and graze unafraid to the sun, o'er a million dead, and my work has scarce begun." It may be from "Revolution Speaks."

"A Halo Round His Head"

J. E. N.—Can you inform me who wrote and where I can find the poem "Sublimated"? I believe it begins "A halo round his head, like one who is transfigured, he was 'still man, I am God-man.'"

"My Comrade"

R. D. M.—I have been trying to find the name of the author of the following quotation:

Grow strong, my comrade . . . that you may stand
Unshaken when I fall; that I may know
The shattered fragments of my song will come
At last to finer melody in you;
That I may tell my heart that you begin
Where passing I leave off, and fathom more.

"Me"

E. R.—Please tell me where I can secure a copy of the poem, which I am told was written by George M. Cohan and begins something like this:

I'm the best pal I ever had,
I like to be with Me;
I like to sit and tell myself
Things confidentially.

"A Simple Ostrich"

W. H. P.—Can you give me the words in full of a ballad about a foolish young ostrich, the latter part of which goes something like this:

If you seek for information, or desire an explanation,
I'm a flowing fount of wisdom which responds to every call.
For assorted gilt-edged knowledge, I can discount any college,
I'm a simple little ostrich, but—I know it all.

"The Kearsarge and Alabama"

E. H.—Having had such excellent success in answer to a previous query, I refer to you again for the recitation or poem as to whether it comes separately or is part of a collection, and if so, the title of that book:

Off Cherbourg front one Summer day,
Our noble ship the Kearsarge lay
Quite anxious her respects to pay
Unto the Alabama.

"Miami"

O. S.—Can any of your readers inform me where I can procure the poem written by Anne Kester entitled "Miami the Beautiful," which begins something like this: "On the banks of Miami River, as it flows on its jade-green way, disclosing to one many beauties, 'ere it flows into Biscayne Bay"?

"A College Man"

C. E.—Many years ago I jotted down some verses under the title, as nearly as I can remember it now, "He Was a College Man!" They dealt good-naturedly with the relation of athletics, or college sports, to the college curriculum from the standpoint of the average undergraduate. I have completely lost track of those verses, and, as an old reader of THE TIMES, desire the help of your department to locate them; or, better still, reproduce them for me.

"Pal of My Heart"

S. K. R.—As you have hunted down so many stray poems for your readers, I wonder if you can tell me the author of the following poem, and if possible by whom it is published or copyrighted:

True to me, kind to me, never deceiving,
Cheering me, helping me, ever believing;
Sad for me, glad for me, never apart;
Dear to me, near to me, pal of my heart.

"Younger Hearts and Gladder"

A. P. C.—Years ago, about 1884, I came upon part of a poem which I would now like to have. All that I remember is:

Oh! well, I'm older now, albeit a little sadder,
And yet I know of older men with younger hearts and gladder.

"A Bag of Tools"

E. T. R.—I am eager to know the title and author from which the following quotation is taken:

Each is given a bag of tools,
A block of wood and a book of rules,
Each must make, are life be done,
A stumbling-block or a stepping-stone.

"Knowledge Is Power"

F. J. R.—Who is the author of the following paragraph and from what work is it quoted:

It is a common sentence that knowledge is power; but who hath duly considered or set forth the power of ignorance? Knowledge slowly hnlids up what ignorance in an hour pulls down. Knowledge, through patient and frugal centuries, enlarges discovery and makes record of it," &c.

"Human Nature"

E. P. U.—Does any one know the poem entitled "A Receipt for a Christmas Pudding," which appeared in Collier's Magazine a number of years ago beginning: "Take some human nature as you find it, most any variety will do"?

ANSWERS

"Railroads! Mountains!"

MISS INEZ HAYNES IRWIN, New York—I am the author of the story entitled "Railroads! Mountains!" asked for in your issue of Oct. 31 by C. T. S. It concerns the later life of a lawyer in the West and appeared in the Metropolitan Magazine in January, 1923.

Miss Alice Cushman Hammond, Burlington, Vt., and A. C. Dutcher, New York, also answered this request.

"Friends of Man"

REV. CHARLES A. STAKELY, Montgomery, Ala.—In answer to the query of A. L. S., in your issue of Oct. 17, concerning the authorship of the quotation:

I would not enter on my list of friends
(Though graced with polish'd manners and fine sense, Yet wanting sensibility) the man
Who needlessly sets foot upon a worm.
An inadvertent step may crush the snail
That crawls at evening in the public path;
But he that has humanity, forewarn'd,
Will tread aside, and let the reptile live.

It will be found in William Cowper's "Winter Walk at Noon," constituting Book VI of "The Task," line 560.

A number of readers answered this query. The information has been sent to our correspondent.

"Watchfires"

HERBERT S. BRIDGE, Cincinnati, Ohio—The line

Social watchfires answering one another through the darkness, for which L. M. S. asked in your issue of Oct. 17, is from Longfellow's poem, "The Golden Milestone," and may be found in any edition of his complete "Poems." The line mentioned above is at the beginning of the poem.

L. Best, Esq., Glen Ridge, N. J., also answered this request.

"Hearing Ears and Seeing Eyes"

WILLIAM W. SUNDERLAND Danbury, Conn.—The poem wanted by E. P. C., in your issue of Oct. 17, 1926, was written by Henry D. Thoreau, and may be found in, "Poems of Nature," which contains fifty poems written by Thoreau, published in London in 1895, and was sold by The Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston. This poem is entitled,

"DREISER will conquer the world"

Universal Recognition for a world masterpiece

An American Tragedy

by THEODORE DREISER

England

"The finest work of fiction yet produced in the United States. To be great a novelist needs neither sweetness nor grace. The essential properties—wholeness, breadth, penetration, truth, vitality—are here. AN AMERICAN TRAGEDY is a very great and very portentous novel indeed. Swift never indicted society half so forcibly as does Mr. Dreiser, since Swift did not believe that each of us is responsible. The whole of this vast, sad book is shot with a rare appreciation of the essential beauty of man's innermost spirit."—The London Spectator.

America

"It is the greatest American novel of our generation."—Joseph Wood Krutch, The Nation.

"I am an old cautious critic not given to rash use of superlatives. So I mean much when I say that AN AMERICAN TRAGEDY is the Mt. Everest of American fiction and it is one of the high hills in all the fiction of the world."—John Macy, Author of The Story of the World's Literature.

France

"Theodore Dreiser is the greatest novelist of our period, certainly the most powerful and most moving since Thomas Hardy. With this tremendous novel—this masterpiece—Dreiser will conquer the world, just as he has conquered America. I know nothing that can be compared to this epic of sorrow, compassion and all of the weakness of the human heart, excepting perhaps, 'Crime and Punishment.'"—Victor Llona, Les Nouvelles Litteraires.

THE WALLS WERE HAZLITT'S NOTEBOOK

When the Essayist Was Living in Milton's Old House He Used the Whitewashed Walls for Jotting Down His Thoughts

New Stories by Tolstoy and Other Works of Fiction

STORIES AND DRAMAS* by Leo N. Tolstoy. Translated from the Russian by Mrs. Lydia Turin, Mrs. H. M. Lucas and C. J. Hogarth. 378 pp. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $2.50.

LEO TOLSTOY is said to have expressed on the eve of his death the opinion that the trunks and bookcases filled with his unpublished manuscripts contained hardly anything in the way of fiction that was worth being published. The great artist was an altogether too exacting critic of his own works. Besides, in the last years of his life he condemned all fiction writing and was, as it were, ashamed of his artistic career. In any case the three volumes of his posthumous works which appeared in 1911 and which sparkled with such masterpieces as "Hadji Muradh," "The Devil," &c., were an eloquent denial of his words.

The volume here under review, which contains a new portion of the hitherto unpublished Tolstoy — thirteen short stories and plays — and which has already been briefly reviewed in THE NEW YORK TIMES from the Russian text, is, on the whole, somewhat below the level of its predecessors. Most of the material we find in it is of secondary interest and importance. Yet the reader will find at least two or three pieces that should rank among Tolstoy's best works. It is true that these gems are small in size—they are all short stories—but the thing that matters is that they are real gems of the purest water.

The volume is, however, valuable and interesting also for another reason. It covers the whole sixty years long period of Tolstoy's creative life; the first piece in it ("The Story of a Yesterday") was written when the author was 22 (in 1851) and is the earliest sample of his writings that we know of, while the last one ("A Conversation") was composed in June, 1910, that is to say, four months before his death. Moreover, the volume contains pieces which, though aesthetically not very valuable, are of great biographic interest. They throw unexpected sidelights on the history of Tolstoy's great masterpieces, on the channels through which his genius developed and on the direction in which his creative mind worked.

Perhaps the best piece of the book is the children's tale which Tolstoy wrote in 1857 and dedicated to his little niece Varenka (it is with her name that the tale is called). It is a unique masterpiece of sunny, childish simplicity and of psychological nuances. There is not a slightest trace of deliberately naïve style in it, not a shadow of that artificiality which is usually to be found in children's tales; yet it unfolds before the reader the psychology of four or five years old heroes with such convincingness that one feels one's self in a new, or, rather, long since forgotten, world where everything is different from the world we grown-ups live in. The whole story is strictly realistic in construction and in style; but Tolstoy succeeds in so etherealizing and dematerializing his words that it plays and glitters like a beam of sunshine magically caught by the author's hand and thrown on paper. One is literally at a loss. Where lies the charm of these simple yet unusual words? Whence eminates this happy, naïvely emotional atmosphere which permeates every line of the story? Yes, this is real mastery. What is still more remarkable is that this whole story is spun out of material which is no material at all, which isn't, it might seem, worth a nickel; three children are taken by their mother for the first time in their life to a theatre: they pay but little attention to that which is taking place on the stage, but a boy and girl sitting in a box beside attract their liveliest curiosity. On their return home they talk and think only of their new friends and retire with the dream of meeting them again and of never parting from them. What can be more trivial than this? Nothing is, however, trivial to those who look at the world for the first time with curious, wide-open eyes. Tolstoy, this past master of reincarnation, succeeded in shaking off his thirty years of life and in taking such a childish glance at the world. And what wonders he had seen!

Equally perfect is the short but meaningful powerful and telling "Dream" which Tolstoy rewrote four times and wanted to work into "War and Peace."

Among other short stories of the volume it is "When Love Dies" and "The Story of a Yesterday" that deserve special mention. The first of them was written when Tolstoy was an officer of 25 fighting in the Caucasus. It is far from being perfect; some of its lyrical digressions are naïve and unconvincing and some of its effects are spoiled by uncamouflaged moralizing. But its interest lies in that it contains in germ the motives out of which developed many years later "The Resurrection," "The Kreutzer Sonata" and perhaps, to a certain extent, "Anna Karenina." Indeed, does not the story of the young, pure and healthy Sereja Ivin taken one night by too obliging friends to a house of tolerance and then weeping over his own downfall remind one of Posdnyshev's career? Are not some of the descriptions and psychological details a dim yet unmistakable premonition of "The Kreutzer Sonata?" Does not the heroine of the story make one think at moments of Katyusha Maslova from "The Resurrection"? It is really a discovery to us that already at 25 Tolstoy bore in his mind the atmosphere, the ideas, the types and the situations which crystallized thirty or forty years later into his world-famous novels.

The four plays contained in the volume can hardly add anything to Tolstoy's literary glory. One of them, "The Nihilist," is an amusing, light and lively but unimportant comedy which was written by the great writer when he had just married and was "the happiest of husbands" for his "domestic theatre"; it was played by his young wife, his sister (subsequently a nun) and his sister-in-law, while he himself sat in the audience and laughed to tears. "The Contaminated Family" is a much longer and a much weaker play; after having written it Tolstoy wanted the Imperial Theatre to produce it, but soon forgot it entirely and tossed it away for good into one of his bookcases. No wonder; he often accorded such treatment to real masterpieces. Why, then, should a hastily written and unperfect play deserve better treatment? Much better are the two plays that he wrote on the decline of his days and also tossed somewhere, "The Dramatic Scenes" and "Peter the Publican." They are masterfully constructed, concise and quick in development and they breathe with the ascetic morality and austerity of their great author's old age.

STELLA BENSON'S FANTASY

GOOD-BYE, STRANGER.* By Stella Benson. 280 pp. New York: The Macmillan Company. $2.25.

DEEP constructive thinking—the favorite indoor sport of a great country like America" is the butt of Stella Benson's nimble mental cleverness in "Good-bye, Stranger." The manly man, the womanly woman, the ideal of domestic goodness, the "Land of Helpful Friends" are all satirized, directly as well as indirectly. Miss Benson's vehicle is a fantastic story against the background of a Chinese suburb called Kan Lu Pa. The American, particularly the American woman, would seem to be a sort of obnoxious universal, like any part of a Ford automobile, according to Miss Benson. Poor Daley Cotton appears to be a sort of animated synthesis from the pages of American women's magazines, from Miss Benson's British view of certain isolated examples, and spiced, perhaps, with a little of Sadie Thompson out of "Rain." The counter-attitude to Daley's unreasoning optimism is set up by the delightfully cantankerous old lady of 86 or so, Daley's mother-in-law. Miss Benson employs an amusing device whereby Daley's husband becomes the old lady's son and is then transformed back into Daley's husband. Certainly the effect of Daley's Americanism upon Clifford Cotton is lamentable.

Shortly after their honeymoon, Clifford brings his "American sweetheart" to visit old Mrs. Cotton in Surrey, England. The very first day, he is touched with the sun, or perhaps with the old lady's stony-hearted individualism, and comes to Daley a stranger. Miss Benson begins her novel seven years later, in the retreat in China where the two women have taken the distracted man. Clifford has become a changeling, inflicted with an ingratiating madness. He speaks out, like a child, whatever comes into his mind.

Clifford's dearest wish is to be ordinary and little-minded, to know how to talk about the articles in his morning newspaper, to wear the clothes that every one else wears, to think as every one else does, to have naturally and effortlessly the manner and the tone and the appearance of the model he must painfully and uncertainly mimic, the manager of a Shanghai bank. He is frightened of the variety of magic which he is obliged to experience and which even his short-sightedness will not entirely dispel. He can see and talk with fairies and he much prefers to understand and resemble stock brokers.

As witnesses to the last fling of Clifford's changeling self and to his return to normal mediocrity, Miss Benson has assembled a curious assortment of characters. The doctor, the British Consul, the resident tobacco salesman are all infatuated with Daley and anxious to console her. The missionary and his wife are bewildered by the whole thing. Three wandering showwomen, putting on their pathetic songs and dances in out-of-the-way corners of the world, give the right note of theatricality to Miss Benson's pleasantly acceptable unreality. Old Mrs. Cotton, with her palsied head and her brokenly emphatic language and her mordant, malicious viewpoint, provides a Greek chorus to interpret the tenuous episodes and the fugitive clashes of personality.

Daley possesses a perfect body, a golden voice and a small, wondering mind. She is full of sweetness and light which she has conscientiously derived from her favorite magazine, "Woman's Helpful Friend." She finds consolation in her three dogs, the minds of which she fills with tiny, pretty thoughts, and her inseparable companion, the Victrola, recalling Sadie Thompson's gramophone in "Rain." When Lena turns up with the three entertainers, Clifford eagerly looks for wisdom, and an antidote to Daley, in Lena's thin, tired body and slightly embittered, unsurprised mind. And he announces, with his childlike fervor, that he loves Lena, calls her a wonderful woman, breaks Daley's heart and delights his villainous mother more than ever.

It is not quite clear why Clifford became a changeling in the first instance. His restoration to the little world of Daley and to America is scarcely less perplexing. Miss Benson, however, has cast the whole story into a fairy-tale mood where anything goes.

MR. SITWELL'S SATIRE

BEFORE THE BOMBARDMENT.* By Osbert Sitwell. 344 pp. New York: George H. Doran Company. $2.50.

OSBERT SITWELL is one of the younger English writers, and one of a brilliant family of writers. For a time it seemed as if he might bring to English letters what hitherto has been conspicuously absent—the three-quarter-length story in the perfection it has attained in Europe, especially in Russia. Another tag for it is the long-short story. In "Triple Fugue" and "Low Tide" Mr. Sitwell appeared well on his way to domesticating this importation, which is a genre distinct both from the novel and the short story, with peculiarities and fascinations of its own. Mr. Conrad did it in "The Planter of Malata" and "Freya of the Seven Isles." As we have said, Mr. Sitwell himself turned the trick. But by what has Mr. Sitwell been tempted? Did it appear to him that fame lay not along that road? Or did his publishers whisper into his ear that the public wants quantity? The question remains to be answered; the present task, a sad one, concerns itself with Mr. Sitwell's "Before the Bombardment."

If the reader will turn to the information at the head of this review, he will learn that "Before the Bombardment" runs to very nearly three-hundred and a half of pages. Consequently, on the yard stick, it must be a novel that has been placed before him. But in no other sense of the word than bulk is it a novel which the author has produced. As a long-short story there would have been something here to place beside "Triple Fugue" and "Low Tide." As in this latter narrative, Mr. Sitwell shows in his new work an interesting flair for analyzing the psychology of aged females, and depicting, with a wit that does not wound, the barrenness of their lives.

The scene of "Before the Bombardment" is laid at an English watering place of the less pretentious sort on the Channel Coast or the North Sea. An elderly lady and her paid companion are permanent guests at one of the hotels. Mr. Sitwell sees revolving around these two the people of the town. With gentle satire he lays bare all the foibles, the petty jealousies, the simpering romances, the friendliness and the callousness of limited people in a circumscribed locale. If his people do not always live in his pages it is because they never lived, but merely existed. A German maid can become the centre of gossip and interest, especially when she goes to the cemetery to take tea with the sexton.

For a moment Miss Bramley felt that she was going to faint, it seemed so unreal and dreamlike. Why, Miss Bramley was almost sure that the German maid had told her she was going to tea with the sexton at the cemetery. It was extraordinary.

To be sure, we take it that Mr. Sitwell intended "Before the Bombardment" to have a wider significance than appears on the surface. But then, every piece of fiction has that. We take it that the author intended his work to be something of a satire on all mankind. What are we, after all, but limited beings? Yet, much as one dislikes to see genius gone wrong, truth compels the insistence that as a satire "Before the Bombardment" fails to impress when insistence is made of wider application.

There can be no gainsaying the fact that Osbert Sitwell has not fallen a whit from his high estate as a writer—when writing may be distinguished from the thing written. But he has proved that he is not a novelist—or, at least, not yet a novelist. As said already, Osbert Sitwell is young. He will probably perceive that delicacy alone will not carry beyond a certain length; more than that, and the result is less than delicacy, it is diaphanousness. In not over 200 pages "Before the Bombardment" would have impressed one as a peculiarly artistic and sensitive piece of work. The mood established at the outset would have maintained itself. We wish Mr. Sitwell would take his book back and cut it down. But that can't be done now. We regret that his publishers did not have him do it before printing.

FEAR OF LIFE

BLINDNESS. By Henry Green. 286 pp. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $2.

THE abstract title is, happily, not a fair indication of the quality of Henry Green's novel. Mr. Green is not at all concerned with those who "have eyes and see not." He is not dealing with the implications, in general, of a physical condition. "Blindness" refers to the misfortune of a specific and rather attractive English boy and the change his unfortunate accident wrought in him. Mr. Green establishes the eager, rebellious character of John Haye in the form of the diary and letters Haye writes during his life at an English public school. The accident and the immediate consequences are somewhat labored, but the total effect is striking.

John Haye at school delights in breaking the unwritten rules of the classroom and playground. He wears a greatcoat when the weather requires it, in spite of the school's tacit ban on that garment. He despises athleticism; he devises "rags" to get a rise out of the stodgy heads; he reads Carlyle and Dostoievsky and Turgenev and talks of them. Mr. Green indicates John's arrogance and superior airs with a few telling strokes. During a short train ride, going home for the holidays, an idle youngster heaves a rock through the window. The glass gashes John's face and puts out his eyes. The narrative thereafter switches from the journal of John to a mixture of objective conversation and episode.

It is impossible to feel sympathy for John. Mr. Green has striven for a realisation of John in other terms. His stepmother is his only relative. She is a hunting woman, fond of horseback riding, her garden, endlessly busy with the affairs of the village, but keenly aware of her responsibility toward John. The estate must be kept up, everything must go on just the same, she must try to interest John in something, she must try to keep him occupied. She even reads to him, much as the confinement irks her. Mr. Green persuades the reader that Mrs. Haye is devoted to the life in the country, but even fonder of John. For the blind boy's sake she pulls up stakes and moves to London.

Mr. Green interpolates a long, rambling section relating to one Joan Entwistle, her drunken father, her unhappy life, her vague maidenly eroticism. Joan's father was formerly the parson on the Haye living. He was ousted on account of his liking for gin and his wife's liking for the postman. After this rather lengthy introduction, Mr. Green presents Joan and John Haye in a romantic interlude which comes to nothing. Joan is probably a strong inducement to Mrs. Haye to leave the country and go to London.

It happens that London terrifies John. The noise deafens him. Street traffic makes him miserable. He does not meet the school friends he hoped to see. He has become more and more terrified of life, more and more helpless and resentful, withdrawn within to his own resources which he is finding meagre beyond description. He means to write, to make something of himself, but he must first nurse himself out of his hypochondria and neurasthenia. Mr. Green brings out that blindness, in the case of John Haye, emphasizes his limitations and ineffectuality. It is reported to be the first novel of a very young man. In spite of certain defects of workmanship, of prolonged episodes, meandering dialogue and confusion of method, it does convey a sense of character under stress. It is a creditable performance.

Brief Reviews

crossed the terrain which was the scene of Abd-el-Krim's long struggle and makes an illuminating exposition of its cause and of the ambitions and purposes of France, Spain, England and Italy that make uncertain the future of Morocco.

The volume is the result of three journeys to North Africa and, in addition to being a fascinating account of things seen and done on his last trip, made a year ago with his daughter as companion, it is replete with graphic historical sketches that give to the modern country its background, necessary for comprehension of its present-day conditions. His narrative shows how different are those conditions from the conceptions usually held and his accounts of his own experiences offer alluring promise for any traveler who wants to get out of the ordinary routes and seek new and more flavorous scenes. Major Powell calls attention to the splendid work of the French as colonizers in North Africa, saying that in a single generation they have "in Africa, alone conquered and consolidated and civilized a colonial empire greater in area than the United States and all of its possessions put together." Nevertheless, his attitude is not wholly that of commendation, for he says that while he yields to none in admiration for what France has achieved in North Africa, "to assert, as have certain American visitors, that the natives are contented with French rule and would give their life's blood to defend it is to take wholly unjustifiable liberties with the truth." In the course of his narrative he speaks his mind freely in both commendation and criticism of the methods and aims of French rule.

While the volume is a book of much interest and value for home reading the author has incorporated so much definite information as to routes, travel conditions, hotels and other matters that the traveler can use it as a guide. The eighty-six illustrations on heavy, tinted paper are particularly good. There are two maps.

Turgenev

Mr. Yarmolinsky goes with some thoroughness into Turgenev's methods of work, his manner of observation, his custom of writing a biography of each character, and so on. One important element, however, that should interest his readers enormously, the writer barely touches. That element in Turgenev's style. In view of the fact that Turgenev was one of the great stylists of his time, that he exercised a prodigious influence not only in Russia but upon writers in France, in England and in other countries, the virtual omission of this aspect of his work seems curious.

But, en revanche, the relations and quarrel with Tolstoy, the relations with all his friends, notably the Russians and the French, Bielinsky, Foeth, Gancharov, Flaubert, Zola, Daudet, his unfailing generosity, all these are recorded with a delicious, appetizing fullness for which this reader, at least, is infinitely grateful. And as to the relationship with Mme. Garcia-Viardot—with all her family, indeed—that element would make a book in itself by a person less opulently steeped in Turgeneviana than is Mr. Yarmolinsky. Many a book has been written with less material than this biographer has put into any single one of these many elements. Despite occasional lapses of style, the book is singularly readable, and upon this head, moreover, it would be churlish to quibble after Mr. Yarmolinsky's modest apology in the preface for "the treacherous ways of a language to which he was not born." But one does wish he had found time and space for a few such analyses of Turgenev's style as, say, Mr. Gerhardi was able to present in his fascinating study of Chekhov. But all together Mr. Yarmolinsky is to be congratulated upon one of the most successful and human biographies we have ever read.

The recent violent storms in Florida and Cuba make the forthcoming appearance of Dr. Isaac M. Cline's book, "Tropical Cyclones," particularly timely. Dr. Cline has had long experience as a meteorologist and forecaster of weather, particularly in the South and Southwest. His book will be published this month by the Macmillan Company.

The Kindergarten Children's Hour

Edited by LUCY WHEELOCK

Head of The Wheelock School for Kindergartners, Boston

The Kindergarten Children's Hour offers a rich library of the most carefully selected material to help mothers in guiding and instructing their children.

A New Idea in Helps for Mothers

IN one volume you will find 135 matchless stories especially adapted for very little children—and such stories are the hardest of all stories to find. Another volume is crammed full of just the right suggestions for games and occupations to answer adequately the cry of "What can we do now, mother?" A third volume tells you how to explain, in a way intensely interesting to your children, the everyday things of life that every child wants to know. Still another volume contains wonderfully inspiring and helpful advice by one of the world's leading experts upon child training, telling how best to handle children of every temperament on all occasions. And lastly a volume of 155 songs that children love, together with singing games.

This gives you but a faint idea of the wealth of material in these five volumes.

Notes on Rare Books

WHEN April had come once again to England, Lewis Carroll—the Rev. Charles L. Dodgson of Christ Church, Oxford—remembered his small friends, the Liddells, and that they made excellent companions for boating excursions on the Thames. He remembered Alice best, of course—Alice of the seraphic face and wistful smile, and he thought of a capital story that would delight her. He sent a brief note to his friend, Canon Duckworth, whom he had named the "Duck" (himself the "Dodo"), to say that "* * * should you be disposed any day soon for a row on the river, * * * I could procure some Liddells as companions." Shortly thereafter he dropped a second note, about the end of April, 1864: "Dear Duckworth, could you help to row my friends on Wednesday?"

Carroll sat in the bow of the tiny boat on that memorable trip, and once in a while he remembered to row, although he splashed a great deal. It was Duckworth who did the work and who kept the boat going straight. And it was over the "Duck's" shoulder that the Rev. Dodgson recited to the wide-eyed Alice and her breathless sister—but chiefly to Alice—the immortal tale of "Alice in Wonderland." From that grew the most famous of children's books; when it was published Carroll took a copy to the "Duck" and inscribed it "R. Duckworth with the sincere regards of the Author, in memory of our voyage."

So adorned that volume naturally became one of the most famous "Alices" in existence. That copy and five others presented to Duckworth is in the catalogue of the library of Mr. Harry Glemby, to be sold by the Anderson Galleries Nov. 15-16, and it is one of many reasons why we found that account of these books to be sold so richly entertaining.

SURELY this is, we think, as fascinating a record of books and autographs as one may hope to find. The catalogue is excellently written, warmly personalized and attractively presented. One may read it straightforwardly, for it is a narrative of books which are often exceptional and nearly always interesting, catalogued in a manner which may be described as anecdotal. It has a breadth that must satisfy even an omnivorous taste. Shakespeare quartos mingle with Stevenson manuscripts—and what an array of MSS. this is; and Conrads—the very aristocrats of inscribed Conrad first editions are familiar with Dickens in parts, with widely miscellaneous autograph letters, with eighteenth century illustrated French books, with illuminated manuscript Horae and famous first editions of English literature, modern and antique.

The catalogue, which has the same format as that of the Clawson sale, is superbly documented and excellently illustrated. Many of the 607 lots which we shall briefly report here may be familiar to bookmen, but they will have a charm undiminished by frequent reporting.

Twenty-five intimate letters of Benjamin Disraeli, mostly addressed to his greatest confidante, his sister Sarah, are one of the first lots to attract attention. These appear to be of the greatest biographical value and offer, as well, an interesting retrospect of the social activities of the day. A presentation copy of Butler's "Erewhon" is a tempting bait to collectors of modern authors, who will find much to interest them, too, in the first editions of Barrie, R. F. Burton, Cabell, Dunsany, inscribed Carmens, Clemens, including the original manuscript of the $30,000 bequest; a particularly fine group of Hardys, many from the great McCutcheon collection; Kiplings, Stevensons and Wilde, of which the last is represented by a copy of the "Happy Prince" on large paper, presented to his wife, &c.

AN ultra-modern letter of Byron, apparently unpublished, enlivens the catalogue. It was written soon after the news of Shelley's death had reached him. He was himself engaged in the struggle for Greek liberty, in which he was soon to die, yet he could write:

I quite agree with you that nothing is worth an effort. As for philosophy & freedom, and all that—they look devilish well in a stanza, but men have always been fools & slaves, and fools & slaves they always will be. * * * Gold is worshipped in all climates without a single temple, and by all classes without a single hypocrite. I love lucre—a noble occupation—do as I do. Lucky is he who has neither creditors, nor offspring, & who owes neither money nor affection—after all the most difficult to pay of the two. * * *

A copy of Goldsmith's "Vicar," first edition, contemporary calf, is present, and such famous and desirable works in English literature as Keats's "Endymion," 1818; Shelley's "Revolt of Islam," original boards, uncut, 1818; "The Cenci," 1819; "Epipsychidion," 1821; "Hellas," 1822, all first editions; the fine Chew copy of Swift's "Gulliver," first issue of the first edition. One of the most valuable groups is the collection of Shakespeare quartos, represented by "The Merchant of Venice," second edition, 1600; "Sir John Old-Castle," second edition, 1600; "Merry Wives of Windsor," second edition, 1619, and the finest copy known of "Romeo and Juliet," the fifth edition, 1637, partially uncut. An excellent copy of the "Poems," 1640, that from the Chew collection, is also listed. There is an interesting collection of Dickens's works many in the original parts, including the prompter's copy of the acting version of "The Strange Gentleman," together with some valuable autograph letters.

THE complete original manuscripts of two important modern novels are part of the Glemby library—George Glasing's "Demos" and McFee's "Casuals of the Sea."

It is in its representation of two modern authors, however, that the Glemby collection is most noteworthy, and these are Conrad and Stevenson. The inscribed Conrads will be familiar to many habitués of American auction rooms, having once before trod the boards, and they will undoubtedly be welcomed again.

If for no other reason, the Stevenson manuscripts which are assembled would be enough to make the Glemby library memorable. There are 128 lots of Stevensons—books, manuscripts and autograph letters. This is an amazing garner; consider the value of a collection of such original manuscripts as these. "Moral Tales," accompanied by four original proof impressions of the extremely rare woodcuts, which it took a former owner twelve years to collect; early draft of "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," "Ticonderoga," complete, written in America; earliest original manuscript of "David Balfour," afterward entitled "Catriona"; drafts of the first chapter of "Weir of Hermiston"; the unpublished blank verse tragedy "Monmouth"; "When the Devil Was Well"; the "Mock Trial," unpublished; miscellaneous poems, including "A Visit From the Sea," two poems in Scots; the unpublished "Authors and Publishers"; the unfinished novel "Heathercat," and the famous series of early letters to his cousin.

Current Magazines

only philosophy audible, if there is even that, is the mere expression of one character or another. When it is completely life it seems to the hasty reader a mere story. Was the Bhagavad Gita the "scenario" from which the Gospels were made?

The mysterious disappearance in Mexico of Ambrose Bierce a few years ago has given rise to many speculations concerning his fate. One of these is made the basis of a story, "Discovery," by Marian Storm, in the November issue of The Forum. A party of sightseers is visiting a cavern in Mexico when suddenly the electric lights go out. While the guides are gone in search of torches one member of the party, groping about in the dark, falls through a crevice in the rock and is plunged into a subterranean river. The current carries him along to a remote and unexplored part of the cavern known only to a few of the Indians of the region, who have established there a temple to the ancient gods. The visitor finds there a white man of venerable appearance who is honored by the natives as a god, and this man proves to be Ambrose Bierce. There in the heart of the mountain he has found peace at last and a devoted band of followers to whom his every word is law. How the real Bierce would have enjoyed that! Or would he? Perhaps the absence of opposition would have robbed life of all savor for such a turbulent spirit.

The Evolution of Human Nature
CONCERNING
IRASCIBLE STRONG
By WILLIAM H. SMYTH

Irascible Strong

The story of the evolution of primitive traits from Irascible Strong and his wife, Trixie Cunning (our earliest ancestors), into the qualities of civilized man is a refreshing, unconventional book on human society.

The late LUTHER BURBANK wrote to the author:

"I rejoice that a man has at last been produced who can see the evolutionary facts of nature and depict them so clearly, so humorously, with such mathematical precision and accurately in accord with the thought of the best modern thinkers on the subjects of evolution and social progress.

"I believe your book will have a tremendous circulation and receive a hearty welcome."

Ask your bookseller to show you the ingenious chart of social development that accompanies the book; then read the story which tells how we got this way.

Act Quickly—SAVE 40%

IF YOU have not yet secured your new Britannica, there is still time to reserve a set in the popular-priced NEW FORM (32 vols. bound as 16) at a saving of 40%.

For the first time in the Britannica's history, a new edition has been brought out in a popular-priced form simultaneously with the more expensively bound Cambridge Issue.

What this Offer Means to You

This means that you can easily afford to own the new Britannica. You can be among the first to possess and use the vital information it contains. You need not wait for weeks, or perhaps months, for its appearance in the lower-priced NEW FORM. For this NEW FORM BRITANNICA is ready now. In many respects this is the most attractive, compact and convenient form in which the ENCYCLOPAEDIA BRITANNICA has ever been published. The contents are identical with the contents of the higher-priced Cambridge Issue. The type is large and easy to read. The paper is thin, yet opaque, tough and durable.

How You Save 40%

The amazingly low price of the Britannica in the NEW FORM is made possible because:

(1) It is printed from the same plates used for the famous Cambridge Issue. This makes it possible to save thousands of dollars, because we do not have to reset 33,000 pages of type.

(2) By having the paper made to order in immense quantities, and binding the 32 volumes as 16 (2 vols. in 1 cover), additional substantial savings are effected in the cost of production.

To the man or woman intent upon getting everything possible out of life, this great work is an endless source of stimulation and interest—a vital necessity in every home or office. It sets an entirely new standard of interest and timeliness, never before approached or even attempted. It carries you right up to the very forefront of today's progress. It records the sweeping changes of the last 16 years—those transforming years whereafter nothing in the world can ever be the same again.

Complete, Authentic

In the 33,000 pages contained within its 32 volumes, are 45,000 separate articles (50,000,000 words) contributed by more than 2,500 authorities, including the foremost living celebrities from every civilized country under the sun.

Only in these pages can you find the full, authentic record of every important development—commercial, industrial, scientific, financial, professional and social.

You Can Afford It

In order to place this universal guide and counsellor within easy reach of every home, it has been published in two forms—the famous Cambridge Issue, (32 vols.) printed on beautiful India paper, and the popular NEW FORM (16 double vols.) printed on the sturdy Britannica Opacity paper, and selling at nearly half the price. Now YOU can realize your life long ambition to own the Britannica—AND you can have it in 16 large, richly-bound volumes, at a trifle more than half the price of the famous Cambridge Issue. But that isn't all.

You can buy it on Easy Terms of payment that will meet the limitations of the most modest family budget. For an initial payment of only $5—you can put the leaders of world thought to work for your advancement now—AT ONCE. But you will have to act quickly, as these sets are selling rapidly and the quantity is limited.

Poets Come To Judgment

Would I were on the scalands
Where the wind knows how to sting,
And in the rocks at midnight
The lost long murmurs sing.

Would I were with my first love
To hear the rush and roar
Of spume below the doorstep
And winds upon the door.

Ah, years are filled with learning
And days are years of change;
And I have met so many,
And knew and found them strange.

But on the scalands tumbled
By winds that sting and blind,
The nights we watched so silent
Come back, come back to mind.

I mind about my first love,
And hear the rush and roar
Of spume below the doorstep,
And winds upon the door.

Mr. Johns's muse is, perhaps, not a wholly robustious muse. One detects something of Housman, something, it may be, of Yeats. And there are other influences discernible. What we like about Johns's poetry is that we are compelled to like it—the compulsion coming from within the poetry itself. Orrick Johns, it seems to us, is rather careless of his gifts; too careless. Or is it that he is shy? We are not sure of the milk of Paradise, but we are very sure

That he on honey dew has fed, and that the elves and the goblins had something to do with it.

Harry Kemp is another gentleman who isn't quite sure whether or not he desires to be a poet; and not always in his verses is he one, and this in spite of the fact that he has turned out more verse than has Orrick Johns. Kemp has always had a supreme disregard for a lot of things (one suspects that often this disregard was a pose), and so he has tried to hew out a way of his own. Hewing out ways of one's own in poetry is not always productive of the best results, but the exercise makes for vigor, and there is much in "The Sea and the Dunes" that is vigorous. The present writer, however, likes Mr. Kemp best when he is simple and humorous, as in "Maine Comradeship":

On crags of spuming granite.
The waves' long leaps were hurled;
Down endless sands the ocean
Went walking round the world.

Fronting creation's pageant
My small thoughts seemed a lie;
Clouds great as mighty cities
Sat in a windless sky.

I looked close for a comrade
And found him, with a smile—
An ant. . . . lost. . . . up a grassblade—
That waved his arms a while!

The thinnest of the six books being considered is Leonard Bacon's "Animula Vagula," running as it does to fewer than two-score pages. In fact, the contents of the book make up a single poem, although this end is achieved by breaking the whole into what apparently are disconnected pieces, differing one from another in theme, treatment and timbre. Mr. Leonard is a philosophical poet, and his verse is often made to stagger under a burden too heavy for it. He writes crabbedly, with acerbity, and at times with power. His poetry suggests Meredith and among present Americans Edwin Arlington Robinson. One can easily imagine him the centre of a cult. To pick one poem—or one fragment—from "Animula Vagula," this sonnet will serve to bear out what has been said:

This is Himalaya that by day or night,
Lifeless, enormous, faces down the sky.
Too thin her air. That glacial crest too high,
Whatever beauty may abide in height,
I have vain years roamed round that summit white,
And though I scaled it, what were gained thereby?
Barrenest vanity of victory,
And blank achievement in my own despite.
Whence comes this numbness on the overweening
Madness that was engenderer of the scheme
With pride? They are defeated like a dream.
They heaved the height. They made the cold peak fair.
They gave false meaning and imperfect meaning.
Give up. Go down, my soul. There is life there.

KINGDOMS OF THE WORLD

By Margaretta Tuttle

A brilliant, witty novel of the Old World and the New, which recounts the story of a modern, headstrong, young American girl who finds herself set down amid the rigorous formalities and traditions of aristocratic Italian society. There is a clash, of course, but it is a clash that ends happily. The author reveals her characers against a fascinating background, and the dialogue has the sparkle of champagne. There is no doubt that Margaretta Tuttle's latest novel will be one of the most popular books of the Fall. $2.00

Hamlin Garland's New Book

TRAIL MAKERS OF THE MIDDLE BORDER

by the author of "A Son of the Middle Border," "A Daughter of the Middle Border," etc.

Hamlin Garland:
An Appreciation
by JOSEPH EDGAR CHAMBERLIN

¶ "Hamlin Garland has been true to the Western life. He has done for it what Hardy has done for Wessex . . . He has described great scenes. He has made his people live in an environment that we can see, if anything, more vividly than we can see the cottages and moors of Wessex . . . At every step he has pictured the beauty not only of the natural scene, but of the lives of the people, of even the terrible toil that they went through . . . For this service to literature and to a race, and for the always vivid record of the white settlers, and for making the prairies as they were stand out forever in the vision of the American people, I call Garland a true and great poet."

—BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT

THIS story of the men who conquered the continent completes the trilogy which Hamlin Garland began in those classics of the Western frontier—"A Son of the Middle Border" and "A Daughter of the Middle Border."

¶ The heroic temper of the pioneers, their tremendous physical adventure, the beauty and cruelty of the frontier forest and prairie are preserved in this plain, old-fashioned, wholesome book.

¶ To the men and women of an older generation whose fireside chronicles form the basis of the story, Hamlin Garland dedicates the book. It is a memory picture of traditional America for those who have pride in the country's past and the men and women who made it.

¶ Constance Garland, daughter of the author, has done the illustrations in the spirit of the volume.

Obtainable now at all book stores—$2.50

¶ "These three books are among those which no American who is proud of his fathers can pass by without reading. They are vivid, they are dramatic, they are the truth . . . They have preserved an epoch within their covers."

—MORGANTOWN POST

¶ "All the picturesqueness that is charactetiatic of Garland's novels, and fidelity to detail that this student of the Middle West knows so well."

—ST. LOUIS GLOBE DEMOCRAT

¶ "Over the whole narrative there is the mellow glow of fireside reminiscence . . . The view of life in 'the state of nature' is almost Rousseaulike in its simplicity and goodness . . . The cynic may smile at this conception, but Mr. Garland is probably a more accurate historian than any cynic; and his picture of the life as one of mingled hardships and loyalties is probably in nine cases out of ten true to the actual circumstances . . . Interesting and moving book." —NEW YORK SUN

Brief Reviews

EXPERIMENTS IN EDUCATION

NEW SCHOOLS IN THE OLD WORLD. By Carleton Washburne, in collaboration with Myron M. Stearns. 174 pp. New York: The John Day Company. $1.75.

A FEW, n very few, books have told American readers something about the few, the very few, schools in this country which are trying out new principles, new ideas, new methods in education and putting new life and new zest into the training of the young. And we are prone to think, with our usual chauvinistic self-complacency, that we have a monopoly upon these progressive ideas and experiments, rare though they are and little known, and that as to our schools and teaching methods the rest of the world can sit at our feet. Mr. Washburne's little book is full of dynamite for the breaking up of that smug conviction. Out in Winnetka, Ill., where he is Public School Superintendent, he has transformed the schools into an educational laboratory, working out and applying new ideas and advanced methods with gratifying success. With the spirit of the true progressive, he went to Europe to see what new light he could find there that would help in solving the great problems of the modern school. There he studied twelve schools in which many distinctive educational experiments are being made, and in this book he tells about them.

In England he visited Oundle, about which, or, rather, around whose methods H. G. Wells has written a book; Streatham Hill School, from which the American Dalton Plan spread among English teachers until more of them knew and were eager about it than had even heard of it in the country of its birth; Bedales, where he found "the ideal of the fullest possible development of each individual child to be the dominant note"; the Marlborough Infants' School, where babies of the London slums teach themselves; the experiment of E. F. O'Neill at Kearsley, Lancashire, where among mill operatives is being tried out what the author describes as one of the three most radical education experiments in Europe; Decroly's School in Belgium; the Humanitarian School in Holland, which he found more remarkable and worth while for its spirit and ideals than for its methods; the experiments in France of Cousinet, who is trying to put into practice the educational philosophy of John Dewey; Clarinegg in Switzerland; an orphanage in Czechoslovakia, which, he says, succeeds "in combining life and education in a truly inspiring way"; Bakule's School in Prague, which upsets some of our basic educational theories with splendid results; and a school in Hamburg, which, testing the most daring experiment he found anywhere, is founded on and really practices the principle of giving the children complete freedom.

The book does not pretend to be scholarly or comprehensive in its accounts of these schools. Rather, its chapters are vivid sketches, reportorial in nature of methods and results, with some discussion of principles involved. And no one interested in educational methods, either in theory or practice, can fail to find it richly stimulating.

EVERY-DAY PSYCHOLOGY

UNDERSTANDING OURSELVES. The Fine Art of Happiness. By Harold Dearden. 260 pp. New York: Boni & Liveright. $3.

NO other non-mechanical science was ever brought quite so immediately into man's practical service as modern psychology. Still in its infancy, it is already being made to do a full measure of work in the attempt to render human life happier and more efficient. Aside from the private and personal forms these efforts take in medical, near-medical and anti-medical circles, there is a steady stream of books setting forth the various ways in which psychology can be of use in every-day life. Some of them are expert in knowledge and its application and some are of little consequence in either way. Among the best of them must be counted this new one by Harold Dearden. He is a London physician specializing in nervous ailments and his book is the result, for the most part, of the methods he has used in the treatment of such cases, although here he applies them also to the normal and well as a means of establishing wholesomeness upon a sure foundation. He tells the individual, after setting forth in non-technical language the facts and principles necessary for the understanding of the nervous system and its influence upon physical and psychical being, how to manage and control his mind and body so efficiently as to protect him from the formation of undesirable habits or to cure them if they are already fastened upon him, to control and modify his instincts, to build up his courage and his strength of character, to overcome excess of suggestibility, to abolish those direful attendants, fear and worry, to train the attention, memory, will, reasoning power, to understand and bring under control impulses and obsessions. Matters connected with sex are treated in the second section of the book with the professional frankness of the physician and with a very clear-eyed and fine appreciation of their importance.

The work is thoroughly scientific in its facts and their presentation and it is written with such clearness, sincerity and high purpose as to make it notable among the many books of the time that essay the application of psychology to life. No one could read it without benefit.

VALENTINO

VALENTINO AS I KNEW HIM. By S. George Ullman. Introduction by O. O. McIntyre. Illustrated. 218 pp. New York: Macy-Masius. $2.

BUSINESS MANAGER, intimate friend, fatherly counselor of the famous moving picture star, Mr. Ullman endeavors to make his biography an interpretation of Valentino's character and an exposition of the reasons why, because of his qualities, he won fame on the screen and the devoted affection not only of his friends but of millions who knew him only by his work in the movies. The author has gathered his material, he says, for this last tribute to his friend "from stories he told me here and there, some related in the great bay window of his Hollywood home, some on horseback riding over the desert at Palm Springs, some on our long railway journeys between California and the East."

Valentino had, apparently, told him much about his childhood and youth, and he reconstructs with considerable completeness all that period of the star's life before he came to the United States in 1913—sent hither by his family on a sort of deportation sentence because they began to fear he was going to be no credit to them and they wanted him so far away that the disgrace they believed was inevitable would not touch them. He had a difficult time and many vicissitudes for a good many years after his arrival before his place in the moving picture world began to be assured and adequately paid.

Mr. Ullman tells all this in such detail that the story might well discourage many an aspirant for movie fame. He emphasizes Valentino's own attitude toward his years as a dancer, saying that while he enjoyed and loved dancing for its own sake he abhorred being a professional dancer. He takes pains also to bring out Valentino's essential masculinity of character and tells how deeply he resented the slurs that were sometimes cast upon him because of the parts he played. Mr. Ullman thinks that his life may have been shortened because of his anger and mental suffering over a reference to him in an editorial in a Chicago paper not long before his final illness. The work is written with tender affection and from the viewpoint of one immersed in the moving picture world.

NORTHERN AFRICA

IN BARBARY. Tunisia, Algeria, Morocco and the Sahara. By E. Alexander Powell. Illustrated. 483 pp. New York: The Century Company. $4.

THIS is the third volume in Major Powell's very interesting trilogy of African travel. The two former portrayed and discussed regions less well known, across the centre of the continent, but they had no more of the flavor of adventure in strange places than he puts into this account of his journey from Tunis across Tunisia, Algeria and Morocco to Agadir on the western coast. For most readers its interest is more direct because of the rapidly increasing number of American tourists who visit North Africa on Winter tours and because the daily news keeps it so frequently before their eyes. Major Powell, for instance, ives, he suggests that, after all, here may have been "error."

Conduct of The War

Under the circumstances, we need ot be unduly astonished if the abinet began to cross-examine obertson somewhat closely and in manner that he resented. Indeed, friendly Minister called on him and sked whether, after all, he ought ot to be ready to accept instructions rom a superior authority. And at he New Year, 1918, the Cabinet put o Robertson a searching question—'Can the General Staff foresee a victorious ending to the war?" Robertson could only reply that "it depended on a variety of circumstances."

It meant that on the western ront the Allies had no certainty of winning the war. At best, it was stalemate. At worst, it was defeat. What turned the scale was "the Associated Power." And it is arguable that, even with the assistance of the United States, the Hindenburg line gave way not because of pressure from the front, but because the props behind had given way. This book does not prove that the United States won the war. But it does suggest that without the United States the war would have been lost.

Sir William Robertson's apologia will arouse diverse judgments. Many will see in it Laocoon struggling bravely to combat the coils of a civilian snake called Lloyd George. Others, however, may discern a yet more pathetic figure—a General entirely disinterested, excellently equipped for his normal duties, inflexibly loyal to colleagues and splendidly courageous when confronted by unexampled difficulties, who yet lacked that touch of genius which was needed for a momentous task. Early in 1918 Robertson resigned. And then followed the German drive, of which, again, two views will be taken—one party holding that it proves him to have been right in resisting a dispersal of the British forces, while the other will reply that it is one more indication that on both sides the western front was—in a military sense—impregnable.

From these volumes the historian will conclude, perhaps, that the true policy would have been to "contain" the Germans on the western front—that is, to allow them to do the hammering and to suffer the casualties involved therein—and to employ the surplus of man-power at the disposal of the Allies in well-directed strokes—like the landing at Alexandretta, suggested by Smuts—which would have cut off large territories controlled and exploited by Germany. It is clear, however, that such philosophy, though grasped with impulse by Lloyd George, Churchill and their colleagues, was quite beyond the range of vision then developed at the War Office in Whitehall.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN

THE FIRST CIVILIZED AMERICAN

BY PHILLIPS RUSSELL

"Franklin is shown to us from every angle of his nature and in every act of his career with the blinding vividness of a running series of closeups in a motion picture. The feat is all the more remarkable in that Mr. Russell does not attempt to "psychologize" his subject, but achieves through letters, documents, epigrams and pictures of Franklin's exterior life as complete a portrait of his multi-visioned, erratic, contradictory soul as I know of.

The ease with which this immense task has been accomplished and the lightness with which it is laid before the reader, make this book, one of the greatest biographies of our time" change their mottos." For the United States he offers, "Vitality, Prosperity, Modernity." This is gentle, coming as it does from a young English intellectual rebel, but it is merely an earmark of his rebelliousness. Had he not been a rebel he might have offered, "Boastfulness, Pseudo-Culture, Mercenariness." Mr. Huxley, behind all his descriptions and analyses and pertinent comments, is asking a question, and that question is the famous one that Pilate put forth and to which he received no answer—"What is truth?" It is the basic truth of humanity for which Mr. Huxley seeks, and he has about as much chance of finding it as Pontius Pilate had.

Mr. Huxley's book is always informed with a wit and lightness of manner that carry agreeably enough the deeper tones implicit in the subject matter. He writes with great ease, and the informal diary-manner in which "Jesting Pilate" is composed is, if anything, an added charm to the book. The emanation of a defiant and individualistic personality rises from the pages, a personality that is essentially modern as we understand modernity today—inquisitive and restless with the shackles of custom and convention, a personality intellectualized and thoroughly sophisticated. His book, therefore, is as much an expression of the time as it is a fleeting glimpse of many strange places that girdle the earth. It is the type of travel book that should please the reader who is as much concerned with the spirit of the world as he is with the colorful material aspects of foreign lands.

Charles S. Brooks's "Roundabout to Canterbury" is also a travel book, but it is set at a far distance from "Jesting Pilate." In the first place, it is not so much concerned with the state of the world and the problems of humanity. Here is travel seen, perhaps, through the eye and not so much the mind, and yet it cannot be relegated to the general heap of books that "describe" things. It is too much of a personal emanation for that. The author, blessed with a whimsical Lamhsian delight in wandering through the byways of South England, travels arm in arm with a blithe humor that aids and abets him at every step. His book, therefore, is a delight from beginning to end, the sort of work that makes the reader desire violently to don a rucksack, gather to him a couple of choice friends and start out on the highways, pausing overnight at little inns and visiting old castles and deserted village greens. Mr. Brooks and his two companions started out from London, going, by way of Deptford, Bromley and Westerham, south to the coast. Then they traveled east, pausing at Rye, Winchelsea, Hastings, Pevensey, Alfriston, Brighton and Worthing. Turning north, they trudged through Arundel, Chichester, Midhurst, Haslemere, Goodalming and Guildford. After that east they went by way of Dorking, Red Hill, Westerham and Maidstone all the way to Canterhury.

Certain highlights stand out in the book, and among them may be noted the descriptions of Rye and Winchelsea and Brighton. With an ease of manner that never forsakes him Mr. Brooks causes these places to appear before the reader. "Rye," he states, "is a town where the streets rise so steep that a pedestrian upon the hill is always short of breath and nothing on wheels can get to the top at all, where houses have leaded windows on the sidewalk with glimpses inside of pewter and brass candlesticks, of generous fireplaces and the smoky beams of ancient hospitality. Both Henry James and Arthur Benson had houses at Rye, and at one time this section of England through which Mr. Brooks travels was a nest of writers, including, besides the two mentioned, Kipling, Wells, Ford Madox Ford and Joseph Conrad. It is easy to understand why this ancient portion of England, this land of the Cinque Ports and the scene of the landing of the Norman William, should be so popular with writers, for it is, after all, the birthplace of modern England. Where the low downs swell against the sky the Saxons once fought against the intruders. Senlac is not so far away, and Hastings, now a dilapidated Summer resort, still suggests the past.

"A Fascinating Book"

You Can't Win

Written by Jack Black from the tumultuous events of his own life—a life rich in unusual thrills and interest. Here is a book recommended to you by:

Clarence Darrow, noted criminal lawyer: "It is a marvelous story that Jack Black tells . . . fascinating from beginning to end . . . will reveal a new world to most readers. A remarkable book; it is vivid and picturesque." —New York Herald Tribune.

Carl Sandburg, poet and biographer: "Just as a story book, 'You Can't Win' is superb . . . among the topnotchers . . . . a document of fact as exciting as the most thrilling fiction. It has kept us awake and haunted and made life more livable." —Chicago Daily News.

A Dagger—then a Kiss

The story of a gypsy loved by a soldier, a priest, and a hunchback.

ALL AT ONCE, above her lover's head, she saw a livid, convulsed face; beside this face there was a hand which held a dagger. It was the face and hand of the priest who had crept into the room. The young girl, frozen mute by the frightful apparition, could not utter even a cry. She saw the poniard descend, and rise dripping.

"Malédiction!" cried the captain, and fell back on the bench.

She fainted. As her eyes closed, as all consciousness left her, she thought she felt a fiery touch upon her lips, a kiss more burning than an executioner's branding-iron.

When she recovered she was surrounded by soldiers of the watch who were carrying off the captain; the priest had disappeared; the window at the back of the room, looking up the river, was wide open; they picked up the priest's cloak, which they supposed belonged to the officer, and she heard them saying:

"'Tis a sorceress who has stabbed a captain."

In Victor Hugo's famous novel, Notre Dame of Paris, the priest, Claude Frollo, archdeacon, alchemist, almost magician, had seen Esmeralda, a beautiful gypsy girl, dancing in the street and had fallen violently in love with her. Yielding to the sudden temptation he has her carried off that night, but the girl is rescued by the gay De Châteaupers, captain of the king's archers. With him she naturally falls in love; surprised in their nocturnal assignation by Frollo, the captain is poniarded by the priest and Esmeralda arrested and put to torture for his murder, although he survives the wound. She is rescued by her grateful slave Quasimodo, the hunchback bell-ringer of the cathedral, and hidden in one of the towers. Hugo's account of Quasimodo's vengeance against Frollo is one of the most thrilling in all literature. MOST TRANSLATIONS AND THE FILMS GIVE ONLY A GARBLED VERSION OF THE STORY.

All of Victor Hugo's Famous Novels have now been completely translated into English from the monumental Edition Nationale, published in Paris, and are now offered to you in absolutely definitive, unabridged, and unexpurgated form at a popular price for the first time.

In these novels you find all the human passions and sentiments. In Notre Dame the noble and the base are mingled. The hunchback loves with devotion, the priest loves with furious hopeless fatality of passion In spite of learning and vows, the romantic gypsy girl's devotion is unscrupulously exploited by the gay fight-of-love soldier. It is a realistic, exotic, phantasmagoria in which the great cathedral and the treacherous Louis XI brood over all. The grotesque side of mediæval life is unveiled in an account, in which Hugo combines the superstitions, the customs, and the thieves talk of the submerged of many nations, of the strange Cour des Miracles, a social cesspool of beggars and criminals, where the lame grow nimble and the blind see, that they may share in nightly orgies.

In The Miserables you find a great series of five novels in which Hugo sets forth his ideas of social democracy. The theme is based on the theory that voluntary expiation and repentance will produce a moral regeneration and reveal to the soul a higher life. The hero is Jean Valjean, an ex-convict becomes a philanthropist, who befriends Fantine, a grisette. He is pursued by Javert, a detective, who is the incarnation of social order. There are hundreds of other characters. This series is full of scenes of great power—the escape of Valjean, his flight through the sewers, the defense of the barricade, the Battle of Waterloo; and many others reveal Hugo's genius at its heights.

In The Toilers of the Sea Gilliat, a fisherman in love with Déruchette, undertakes a herculean task, and, in spite of a struggle with a devil-fish and other obstacles, succeeds—only to find his labor in vain. In The Laughing Man a poor disfigured youth, lost son of a peer of England who loves the beautiful but blind Dea, finds himself furiously loved by a duchess—one of Hugo's most remarkable creations "a virgin Messalina, an immaculate Bacchante" who offers herself to him.

In Ninety-three you follow the strange career of a woman of Paris amid stirring scenes of the French Revolution. In Han of Iceland a young captain, in love with a chancellor's daughter, fights a great duel. In Bug Jargal a slave secretly in love with his master's daughter leads a revolt in St. Domingo. In Last Day of a Condemned, written as a protest against capital punishment, you find a startling psychological analysis of the sensations of a man condemned to death—his fear, his agony, his despair, his frantic attempts to break the circle slowly closing upon him. Claude Gueux is also a protest against the death penalty.

The illustrations of this edition are those prepared under the direction of the Société Nationale, formed by French booklovers for the purpose of making a set of illustrations that would be "an incomparable monument to the literary and artistic genius of France."

Hugo by the greatness of his genius towers above his rivals. His powerful novels form a distinct class. His world-wide popularity prove their fascinating interest.

You may have seen abridged translations; to know what Hugo's novels are really like, to get every word just as Hugo wrote it, you should see this copyrighted translation, printed from the same plates used to print the edition on Japanese paper for which subscribers paid $420.00 per set. THE ever-present problem of the younger generation is considered by James Truslow Adams in his article on "Our Dissolving Ethics" in the November Atlantic Monthly. Mr. Adams holds that the younger generation in being made the scapegoat for a state of affairs which it has had but a small part, if any, in creating. He points out that the ideas on which the conduct of the younger generation is based did not originate with the younger generation. It was the older generation which began, to cite one example, to question the authenticity of the Bible as the inspired word of God. Once that belief is discarded there is no divine sanction for the code of ethics contained in the Bible. The older generation, while it did not always live up to that code, yet continued from force of habit to accept it as a standard of conduct. Young people of today, not having been taught in youth to accept the Bible as final authority in all things, see no reason for accepting its code of ethics. The author concludes his article with these words:

> Our ethics and their old sanctions are already in dissolution. That has been accomplished by the older, not the younger, generation. What the younger generation and their children may be called upon to do may be to make the most rapid, far-reaching and conscientiously intelligent readjustment of ethical ideas to altered social structure that the race has ever been called upon to make. We of the older generation have played with ideas and let loose forces the power of which we little dreamed of. We have, indeed, sowed the wind, and it will be those of the younger generation who will reap the whirlwind unless they can control it. Individually we may feel guiltless. We may merely have been busy with our intellectual hobbies, our money getting, our loving and striving, but we surely cannot lay the blame for the intellectual or moral conditions upon the scapegoat of the younger generation. To condemn them and regard ourselves complacently is as unjust as it is unwarranted. They have inherited, perhaps, the biggest mess and biggest problem that was ever bequeathed by one generation to another. Never has the road been wilder or the signposts fewer.
> I might apply to the present situation the words of Leslie Stephen: "Each must act as he thinks best, and if he is wrong, so much the worse for him. We stand on a mountain pass in the midst of whirling snow and blinding mist, through which we get glimpses now and then of paths which may be deceptive. If all stand still we shall be frozen to death. If we take the wrong road we shall be dashed to pieces. We do not certainly know whether there is any right road. What must we do? 'Be strong and of good courage.' Act for the best, hope for the best and take what comes. If death ends all we cannot well do better."

The leading feature of the November Dial is "Estrangement: Being Some Fifty Thoughts from a Diary Kept by William Butler Yeats in the Year Nineteen Hundred and Nine." Most of the notes are brief, as if the author had set down his thoughts as they came to him, to be further developed in the future, should the occasion arise. The first note gives the key to the rest. It reads:

> To keep these notes natural and useful to me I must keep one note from leading on to another, that I may not surrender myself to literature. Every note must come as a casual thought; then it will be my life. Neither Christ nor Buddha nor Socrates wrote a book, for to do that is to exchange life for a logical process.

As might be expected, many of the notes deal with poetry and the drama. Here is one which gives the author's conception of the development of a play:

> In Christianity, what was philosophy in Eastern Asia became life, biography and drama. A play passes through the same process in being written. At first, if it has psychological depth, there is a bundle of ideas, something that can be stated in philosophical terms; my Countess Cathlee, for instance, was once the moral question, may a soul sacrifice itself for a good end? but gradually philosophy is eliminated until at last the

THE MEANING OF A LIBERAL EDUCATION

By Everett Dean Martin
Author of "Psychology," etc.

This book is not concerned with schools or colleges or methods of instruction, but raises the deepest questions about human life. It deals with the growing interest of people in education as a gospel of self-improvement and social salvation. It undertakes to interpret education as a possible way of thinking about things and of daily living, and to help us determine what an educated person really is.

What is Worth Knowing?

Does knowledge really help us? What do people expect to become when they set out to improve their minds? All sorts of things are called education. What is it? What are the essentials of a liberal education?

Price, $3.00

The American Library Association says "Everett Dean Martin holds a leading position in adult education. He is the director of The People's Institute, an institution which has had a unique history, notably in the success with which it has been able to reach large numbers of people and, at the same time, maintain uncompromising standards of scholarship." Mr. Martin has been chosen Chairman of the Executive Committee of the recently formed American Association for Adult Education.

MODERN SCIENCE AND PEOPLE'S HEALTH

Edited by BENJAMIN C. GRUENBERG
Director, American Association for Medical Progress
With the Collaboration of

CHARLES R. STOCKARD, M.D., Professor of Anatomy, Cornell University Medical College
HUGH S. TAYLOR, Ph.D., Professor of Physical Education, Princeton University
WALTER H. EDDY, Ph.D., Professor of Physiological Chemistry, Teachers' College, Columbia University
WILLIAM A. WHITE, M.D., Supt. St. Elizabeth's Hospital, Washington, D.C.
C. E. A. WINSLOW, Dr.P.H., Professor of Public Health, Yale University
HAVEN EMERSON, M.D., Public Health Administration, Columbia University

This group of distinguished authorities has joined forces to give to the general public, in clear language, the "secrets" of the remarkable advance in medical knowledge within our time. The result is a book which is certain to become a health classic and deserves a prominent place in every home library.

This is the story of what science is doing for people's health. An anatomist tells of what it has learned about heredity and environment; a chemist of what drugs it has created for the prevention and cure of disease; a physiologist of the principles of diet and proper nutrition, and of such new discoveries as vitamines and insulin; a psychiatrist of the fitting of human beings into the complex and trying conditions of our artificial life today; a bacteriologist reviews the fight to control communicable disease; a former public health official summarizes how these experimental sciences improve the quality of our health, lengthen life and make it more secure. Illustrated, $2.50

Leading authorities are urging that everyone be brought to a realization that the modern practice of medicine is grounded in science, not on mystery, fancy and tradition. This book, sponsored by the American Association for Medical Progress, gives the reader a comprehensive presentation of what science is doing to make life healthful, more secure and more complete.

What the dentists say about this modern plague of gum disorders

Soft food is to blame, they declare, because it deprives our gums of the stimulation they need to keep them sound and healthy

THERE are three short quotations printed on this page. They are picked at random from a mass of similar evidence. But you will find it worth while—well worth while—to give them just a moment of thought and study.

For with professional terseness, they give the gist of the dentists' view toward these stubborn troubles of the gums that plague so many thousands.

And as to the cause of these troubles, there is no longer a shadow of doubt. The professional journals and textbooks are filled with references to it; repeatedly it crops up at dental meetings. Soft food, the dentists agree, must bear the major share of the blame.

How soft food endangers the health of our gums

It's these creamy, rich and appetizing foods of ours—these modern culinary triumphs, if you please—that cause most of the trouble. For these foods make things too easy, too luxurious, for our gums. They completely lack the coarse and fibrous elements that stimulate the gums and encourage a vigorous circulation of the blood within their walls.

So, deprived of the normal massage that mastication should provide, the tiny cells of the gingival tissues are not renewed and strengthened as they should be. The gums become soft and sensitive—too weak to resist the encroachments of disease and infection. And sooner or later "pink tooth brush" puts in its appearance—the forerunner of more serious troubles.

How Ipana and massage restore the gums to health

If you ask your own dentist how best to care for your gums, he will tell you that the first step is to restore to them the stimulation your food deprives them of. Very likely he will explain to you the new doctrine of gum massage that is gaining so many thousands of followers, and show you the simple technique of this gentle frictionizing with the fingers and with the brush.

Probably, too, he will recommend that you perform both the massage and the twice-daily brushing of your teeth with Ipana.

Nearly all our modern food is soft, entirely lacking in the fibre that once kept gums and teeth sound and healthy.

HOW THE DENTISTS STATE THE CASE AGAINST SOFT FOOD

Look over these excerpts—quoted from authoritative professional lectures and writings. The dentists agree that soft food is the cause of nearly all gum troubles and that stimulation and massage are the proper correctives.

From a recent professional paper:

"Rendering the food superfine is an echo of the oft-repeated charge that we do not use our mastication muscles enough—that we establish a blood stasis and thus deprive the teeth and gums of circulating nourishment."

From a noted authority:

"To replace the benefits derived from natural living, which now seems almost impossible, the artificial production of similar effects is attempted through the several forms of exercise. Applied to the dental tissues various methods have been devised to artificially stimulate an adequate blood supply to compensate in some degree for the loss of normal function."

From a textbook on preventive dentistry:

"The instant the gums are brushed properly the blood starts to flow more rapidly and a new life and color make their appearance. After a thorough prophylactic treatment it is not unusual to see the tissues lighten in color, possibly two or three shades in twenty-four hours.

For because of its ziratol content, Ipana will exert its own healing influence. Ziratol is an antiseptic and hemostatic held in high regard by dentists the country over and used by them for years in their practice. Its presence gives Ipana the power to aid in the toning and strengthening of weakened gum tissue, and to enhance the benefits both of the massage and of the ordinary brushing.

Give your gums Ipana's benefits for just a single month

The ten-day tube, sent gladly if you mail the coupon, will quickly show you that for keeping your teeth white and brilliant Ipana has no superior. You will be delighted, too, with its delicious taste and inimitable flavor.

But the full-size tube, good for more than a hundred brushings, offers the fairer test of its good effects upon your gums. So get a large tube at the drug store today and start tonight to restore your gums to sound and sturdy health.

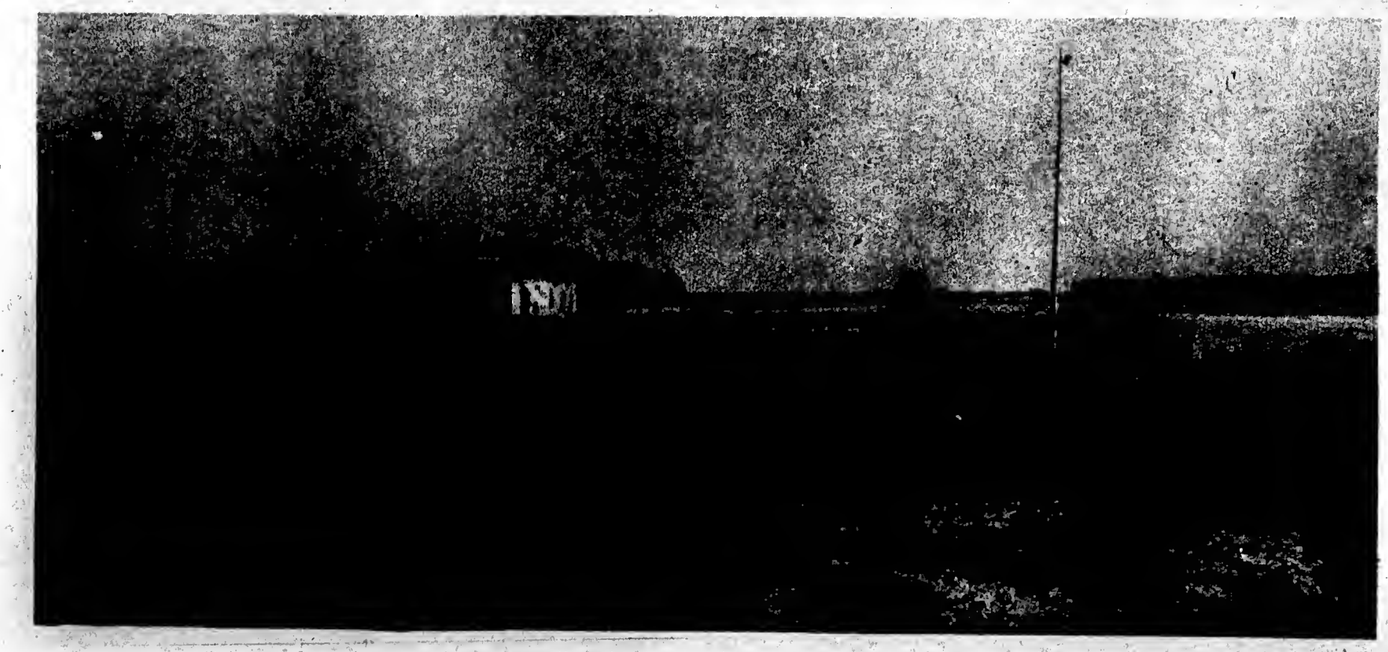
CLEMENCEAU SEEKS LIFE'S TRUTH

"The Tiger," Now a Man of Contemplation, Looks Coldly on Progress and Dismisses Some Illusions of His Youth, Yet He Still Finds Deep Joy in the Great Adventure of Living



Clemenceau on the Beach at La Vendee.

By HAROLD CALLENDER

PARIS.

IN his modest apartment in the Rue Franklin, seated at—or rather in—that curiously shaped but commodious desk that almost encompasses his chair, a black skullcap on his head and the customary black gloves on his hands, Georges Clemenceau remarked that he had no intention of writing an autobiography.

"I probably shall write another book after the present one is done," he added. "But there will be no memoirs. I am a man of action, and when an event is over I pass on to something else."

After more than eighty years of an extraordinarily energetic life, the man of action has become a man of contemplation. He no longer writes fiery political editorials, composed with the news ticker at his elbow. But the mental habits of the man of action persist in the form of an indisposition to review and analyze his own career, so in place of those topical articles he devotes himself to philosophical essays. M. Clemenceau's forthcoming book, "Au Soir de la Pensée," considerable parts of which lately have appeared in L'Illustration, will express his reflections upon life and the possibility of progress, rather than upon the particular social dilemmas that harass the contemporary world.

It is as if a grizzled warrior should turn in later years, not to a history of his campaigns or a justification of his conduct, but to a dissertation on military theory. It is as if an old sea captain should pass his retirement in writing, not dashing and dramatic tales of typhoons, cannibal islands and shipwrecks, but a treatise on the art of navigation.

Many, perhaps most, elderly men find their minds a bit fatigued by decades of activity, reverting inevitably to the events of their earlier life. Anatole France, in his last years, wrote charming stories of his own infancy and adolescence. Henry Adams's old age was plagued by an eager, almost feverish, desire to round out and complete an education that he considered gravely inadequate, and that was never to be finished.

M. Clemenceau is not preoccupied with the past. If he writes a book entitled "Demosthenes," it is to convey, in the form of a parable, a criticism of the present. He is even more interested in the future, and in such ultimate subjects as the value and potentiality of life—which might be said to lie even beyond the future. And when he discusses them, it is not in the manner of an Adams, whose entire life was spent in detached study and contemplation; it is as a man who has lived for fourscore of years in the midst of the buffeting and bruising currents of the active world, and who has formed from a rather rough and painful experience his conceptions of the limits imposed upon the man of action, if not upon human volition itself.

Thus the "Tiger"—who, as he himself observes, is past the age of running, but still likes to walk; whose mental, if not his physical, faculties appear as vigorous as ever—seats himself upon the sand of the Vendée to dream and reflect, not upon his own memorable achievements in the days of his fleetness, but upon the universe which he and his fellow-creatures have struggled, sometimes so futilely, to master and understand. After playing for years a leading rôle upon the European stage, he has withdrawn to a quiet lair, a simple cottage on the Bay of Biscay, a few miles from the place of his birth—where, at the age of 4 years, he saw his father led away by gendarmes because of his radical opinions. The boy clenched his teeth and shouted: "I will avenge you," and from that moment on, apparently, Clemenceau was a republican and a radical.

"The Tiger" at His Window.

The "Tiger's" household consists only of an elderly gardener, who adores him, and a woman who comes from the nearby village to cook his meals. But since the scene from his window "presents before him all the problems of life," he has plenty of company. What is he? What is life? Is death an escape from prison, or merely a change of prisons? "I have lived upon noise, and now I hear the muffled steps of silence. While I still can speak, what concluding words shall I utter? Is it wise or foolish to express myself? To speak before having understood—is not that too often our fate? Too soon or too late; will that be, then, my alternative, at the hour when even the time for regrets is to be forbidden me? . . . At sunset the laborer stands up, stiffened by toil at the plow. Where find the instrument to make the furrows of tomorrow? For what kind of seed? For what harvests?"

When Clemenceau moved into the Latin Quarter in 1860 at the age of 19 "The Origin of Species" had just burst upon the world. Herbert Spencer was at work on his "Synthetic Philosophy." John Stuart Mill was stimulating English political thought, and the forces making for the Civil War in America were approaching the point of eruption. What direction, in those circumstances, would the mind of a studious young man, the son of a physician and free-thinker, himself preparing for a medical degree, be likely to take?

In philosophy, reliance upon experimental science, upon the inductive method and empiricism; in politics, radicalism, in the nineteenth century English sense of the term, held sway. Clem- (Continued on Page 20)

FAMOUS 'BANBURY CROSS' IS THREATENED

Motorists Complain That This Monument of Childhood Is In the Way—The Voice of England Protests

By F. L. MINNIGERODE

SOME of the citizens of Banbury, Oxfordshire—aided and abetted by motorists—propose to tear down the one thing that has made Banbury famous throughout the English-speaking world for generations. They intend to destroy Banbury Cross, and England is raising her voice in angry protest.

Tear down Banbury Cross! Submerge all the fine sentiment that clings to such a wonderfully picturesque memory at the beck and call of twentieth century automobile drivers who think only in terms of speed? Obliterate forever a shrine at which the eyes of a million children have danced and whose earliest imagination caught the colors of romance in their nurseries from its happy rollicking? Millions of children have delighted in the old rhyme:

Ride a cock horse to Banbury Cross
To see a fine lady ride a white horse,
With rings on her fingers and bells on her toes,
She shall have music wherever she goes.

Complaint of Motorists

But motorists say the cross is a nuisance, forcing them to slow down a bit in passing. It is dangerous, they say, and adds to the difficulties of driving. They go even further and protest that from time to time it causes traffic delays. Some of the City Fathers of Banbury, harkening to these voices, are said to be in favor of the proposed removal. England, however, is England and is making manifest her belief that "the child is father to the man." Banbury is being told what England thinks of this soulless proposal.

And Banbury is going to hear more. She will hear a chorus of thousands upon thousands of voices coming from nurseries throughout all lands where floats the Union Jack or the Stars and Stripes. Banbury will think twice, perhaps, before killing a thing loved hy the whole English-speaking world.

Tear down Banbury Cross? As well break Aladdin's Lamp into ten thousand pieces and cast them into the sea! If the motor age calls for such sacrifice would not Little Miss Muffett and Little Tommy Tittlemouse and the hundred other living, moving, breathing chums of babyhood rise and point fingers of reproach?

All the companions of the nursery would come to the funeral. There, in ghostly assemblage, standing in a solemn circle, they would be mute with anguish as the foreman of the demolition squad raised his sledge to strike the first blow. How they would wince to see the passing of one of their companions in earliest romance—this children's idyl!

All the little ones in tears. Little Miss Muffett would cling to the shaking hand of Jack-Be-Nimble. Mary and her lamb would appear dejectedly by the side of the cow that jumped over the moon and the little dog that laughed to "see such sport" would be laughing no more.

The mouse that ran up the clock, the cat and the fiddle and that other pussycat who went to London to visit the queen would then be bowed with a common grief.

How woebegone would be the five little pigs that have gone to market so many times on baby toes and fingers. Goosey, goosey Gander would sadly come from wandering in My Lady's chamber. On a naked Autumn bough the four-and-twenty blackbirds that made such a dainty dish and sang before the King would sit and watch the destruction of an old companion around which they once flew in such high feather. Old King Cole for the first time in his life would not be merry, but the picture, rather of dejection, drawing Little Tommy Tucker close to him. They would bury their faces in their hands.

Nor is the solemn circle half completed. Boy Blue, Jack Horner, Little Bo-Peep, Old Mother Hubbard, the Old Lady That Lived in a Shoe with her many children, Mary, Mary, quite contrary, Curley Locks, Jack and Jill, Humpty-Dumpty, Simple Simon and the Pieman, See-Saw Marjorie Daw—all would be inconsolable. All would perfectly understand that something very dreadful was taking place. Baa, baa Blacksheep, the Spider and the Fly, Three Blind Mice and all the rest of the splendid company would come to take a last look at their beloved Banbury Cross.

Suddenly from out the shadow of the cross comes the Fine Lady riding a white horse. The immortal company of children's friends falls in behind her and leads them into some kindlier land where babyhood and sentiment are cherished things. The people of Banbury are suffering, perhaps, from an attack of reversion to type. They have been destroyers from time to time. Destructive instincts are in their blood and have been for many centuries. They have a taint of Puritan intolerance. At times they have shown an almost fanatical love of destruction.

Back in 1601 they smashed four ancient crosses. There was a pageant in Banbury. Perhaps the Fine Lady was there on her white horse and no doubt many children rode cock-horses into the old square to take part and to see the rings flash and hear the bells tinkle on the Fine Lady. But the Puritan glooms set upon the happy crowds and drove them out of town. Then "at once with axes and hammers" High Cross and Weeping Cross were broken down.

Intolerant Banbury

In those distant days Banbury was known as a fanatical place. "Banbury man" became, throughout England, synonymous with "intolerant man." In Jonson's play, "Zeal-of-the-Land," Busy was a "Banbury blood o' the sincere stud." Drunken Barnaby sings in deathless verse:

To Banbury came I, O profane one,
Where I saw a puritane one,
Hanging of his cat on Monday
For killing of a mouse on Sunday.

Once upon a time Banbury boasted a beautiful church, "more like a cathedral than a parish church." It grew to old age and became greatly in need of repairs. But "a thing of beauty is a joy forever" found no favor in Banbury and the people saw no need for such a lovely church. So no attempt was made to restore it. In fact, Banbury went to the other extreme and refused to allow this fine old edifice to die a natural death. It was blown up with gunpowder in 1790.

The burgesses justified themselves for this destruction by asserting that they had done it "to avoid the expense of repair and to put money in the pockets of some worthless local builders." It may be said in defense of the people of Banbury that the town only went a step further than that word can still carry when it is sung with a full orchestra.

Count Gozzi, it has already been said, wrote his Memoirs, labeled "Useless." It was a romantico-political affair that gave him the excuse for writing these confessions. Two ladies were involved and a second-rate politician of Venice, by name Gratarol—a gentleman with his eye on ambassadorships. For such posts of honor in the Republic of St. Mark were more profitable than they are in our own Republic.

This Gratarol had offended a very great lady indeed, the wife of Andrea Tron, Procurator of St. Mark. He had also, it appears, captured from "Protector" Gozzi the favors and the affections of Teodora Ricci. In the end Gratarol fled the country, and from the safe distance of Sweden (or some such refuge) wrote what he thought of Gozzi. The Memoirs were Gozzi's reply.

Perhaps the merits of the quarrel are not important now that both ladies are memories and both gallants are dust. But John Addington Symonds insisted that there is in what this writer for the theatre has written about life in Venice in the last half of the eighteenth century a picture done in lively colors and well worth preserving. He was so sure of it that he made (quite a long time ago) an English translation of the "Useless Memoirs" in two volumes and declined to omit the love escapades, which, as a part of the record of fact, are unblushingly recited. Those who are curious can therefore learn at their leisure more about the real librettist of "Turandot."

On the published program of the opera this honor is divided between Giuseppe Adami and Renato Simoni. The program, for the Milan production at least, did not mention Gozzi at all. The more reason for saying so much about him here. For it is certain, whatever the praiseworthy ingenuity of the adapters, that the "lyric drama" which carries the Puccini score would never have been written if the old Venetian's Fiabe had not been lying around handy. Quaintly enough, it seems that it is Schiller's German version of the original Italian stage piece which has served the present Italian librettists as the direct source of inspiration for the operatic text. Puccini's reputation for international complications in his operas is maintained. Even when his original is Italian and his librettist are Venetians he gets at it through the German.

FAMOUS FENCING TITLE WAS WON HERE

MORE than forty years ago a duel was fought with foils for the fencing championship of the world, but it was none the less a duel, since both men were bitter rivals in deadly earnest.

Regis Senac of New York and Louis Tronchet of Paris were the most noted fencing masters of that period. Each had a large following and each claimed to be the best in his profession. After much acrimonious controversy Tronchet came to New York and challenged Senac to a public fencing match for the championship and a purse of $1,000.

The match was held in March, 1887, and Cosmopolitan Hall was packed with an enthusiastic crowd. French dueling swords were used, with chalked buttons on their points designed for imprinting a white mark when they touched an opponent. From the neck to the belt and from the shoulder seam to the under-arm seam limited the touches that counted.

The swordsmen were dressed in black velvet with white gauntlets and red belts. They wore iron masks and fought with cold ferocity. Though Senac was only disarmed once and Tronchet three times, Senac made only 14 points to the young Parisian's 17.

TRAITOR CAUSED THE LOSS OF NEW YORK

morning of the 16th, and were vigorously pushed home. Upper Manhattan was then a real wilderness, too rocky and irregular in most places to be worth clearing, and with but one main road rambling through the woods toward King's Bridge and Albany. The Americans liked to fight on ground like this, and they were, as Greene and Putnam had reported, in high spirits. There had been frequent skirmishes along this front, as there had been on the Bronx River during the White Plains campaign, and man for man the Revolutionists knew themselves as good as the enemy. They stood to their weapons at every point and exacted grim payment for every rod they yielded.

Washington, at Fort Lee, heard the roar of cannon and rattle of musketry and saw the smoke rising above the trees. With him on that day was Tom Paine, author of "Common Sense," who did not yet foresee the time when he should turn upon his General and denounce him as a hypocrite and an aristocrat. For an hour or so, so fiercely did the sounds of battle rise, Washington was encouraged to believe that the Americans might hold out until nightfall.

An aide-de camp, taking a hastily scrawled message addressed to Colonel Magaw, scrambled down the steep slopes beneath Fort Lee and was rowed to the Manhattan side. While the boat waited he ran up the hill to Fort Washington, with the Hessians firing at him and even close enough to thrust at him with their bayonets, and gave the note to Magaw. It was an assurance from Washington that he would bring the garrison off if Magaw could last out the day. But Magaw shook his head sadly. The confident Pennsylvanian was facing bitter truth. The aide-de-camp ran the gauntlet of the Hessian lines again, escaped unscathed and took the bad news back to Washington.

Close Quarters

The tide of battle was rolling in from all sides. On the north the British had driven Colonel Rawlings and his Maryland riflemen out of what was later named Fort Tryon, and Cock Hill, also on the north, had fallen. Colonel Baxter, pouring volley after volley into the Forty-second Highlanders at Laurel Hill, had fallen with his face to the enemy. From north and east the Americans were pouring in toward the fort, with the British stumbling after them. Steadily the grenadiers and Highlanders came on, losing three or four times as many men killed and wounded as the Americans did in this hushwhacking style of combat, but never relenting. Their blood was up. They may have cared little about the political aspects of American independence, but they were wild to come to close quarters with their elusive and dangerous enemy.

But the real heroes of the day, if the name can be given to men who had been sold like cattle and were fighting for their beer and shilling rather than their king and country, were the Hessians under Rahl and Knyphausen. Many of them were facing Cadwalader of Pennsylvania, who was holding the Harlem lines. The Pennsylvanians shot accurately. Lord Percy, riding along this front, had his horse twice wounded under him.

The Hessians had rough country to traverse. They came on panting, with blood in their eyes, clutching the bushes to pull themselves up over the rocks. Rahl set an example worthy of a better cause, fighting in the front line with his soldiers, and tearing down fences with his own hands to let them pass. There were those who long remembered him, yelling like a madman, "Forward, my brave grenadiers, every man of you!" Many an American rifleman must have leveled at him, but his time was yet to come; the cold gray morning of Trenton had not dawned.

Cadwalader's men, like the others, had to give way. By the middle of the day all that were left of Magaw's garrison were crowded within the narrow limits of the inner fort—nearly three thousand men in a space intended for one thousand. The walls were low, there were no casements, there was no water. Let the British bring up their guns and a plunging fire would create hideous carnage.

The Hessians, mad with rage, had bayoneted the last of the fugitives, Washington, who could see the details of the fight as it swept near the Hudson River, is said to have "wept with the tenderness of a child." For the moment, one need not doubt, he would rather have been a subaltern and fighting recklessly in the thick of it than a general, safe on the opposite bank, with so many brave lives upon his conscience. Why had he listened to Greene? Why had he obeyed so implicitly the paper warriors of Philadelphia? He could have saved this garrison and he had not done so. The thought embittered him for many a day thereafter.

A British officer came up with a flag of truce to the gates of the fort. The firing stopped and the smoke drifted into the hazy distance. Magaw asked four hours to consider the demand for a surrender. He was given half an hour. Through the woods, as he knew, the British artillery was being brought within easy range. The half hour passed. The Pennsylvanians grounded their arms and passed out of the fort between the ranks of Rahl's and Knyphausen's second Hessian division, to whom the word Trenton had as yet no sinister meaning. There were 2,818 American prisoners. By nightfall they had been marched back into New York City, and the trulls and camp followers of the British army were peering into their faces and demanding with ribald laughter, "Show us Washington. Which is Washington?"

But after the fighting had ceased there was no massacre, nor very much rough treatment. A Scotch sergeant looked over his youthful prisoners and shook his head solemnly. "Young men," he said, "young men, ye should never fight against your King." A young officer rode up. "What!" he cried, "taking prisoners! Kill 'em—kill every man of 'em!" But this was merely a military idea of humor. The order was not acted on. The real atrocities came later when scores of the poor wretches taken at Fort Washington died of malnutrition and disease in the sugar houses and prison hulks of the British provost marshal.

In the anguish of the moment Washington wrote one of his gloomiest letters to his brother, Augustine. "This," he said, "is a most unfortunate affair and has given me great mortification, as we have lost not only 2,000 men (as has been seen, this was an underestimate; the real number was 2,818) that were there, but a great deal of artillery and some of the best arms we had. And what adds to my mortification is that the post, after the last ship went past it, was held contrary to my wishes and opinion."

The fact was that even Washington's friends thought less of him as a general at this moment than they probably did before or afterward. As for that magnificent cavalier, General Charles Lee, with his European background and habitual contempt for things American, it was his opinion that this fiasco should dispose of George Washington as a supreme military commander. He rather fancied the idea of taking on the job himself, and in his camp on the hills beyond White Plains he sat revolving plans for securing Washington's place.

Yet Washington had blundered, not by misinterpreting a military situation, but by deferring too much to other men's wishes and opinions. Congress had insisted that he hold Fort Washington. Greene had argued that it could be done. Washington was well aware of the natural prejudice among a democratic people against professional soldiers. There were some men then and more afterward who suspected that he himself would try to set up as a dictator. Were he to consider merely the military necessities of a situation and ignore the strategic recommendations of the Philadelphia Congress, this suspicion might be confirmed. And at that stage it would not have needed much to shake popular confidence in the new Government and give the Revolution its quietus. Either way Washington faced disaster.

With this defeat the Americans lost their last hold on Manhattan Island, which was to be purely British property and a golden refuge for loyalists for several years to come. There seemed no longer any doubt that the British could drive the patriot army from any position they chose to attack. The question that remained—and that grew less easy to answer as the months passed—was whether they could wipe it out of existence.

The stage was now set for more desperate remedies and worse calamities. Washington's army began to dwindle again. The militia were on the point of going home—they always were, and naturally, for like other men they loved their families and were anxious about their private affairs. But for the faithful minority who stuck to the colors these marches and conflicts were an incomparable school in the art of war. In the red heat of battle an army was being hammered into being—an army that would have no equal on this continent until the fearful furnaces of the Civil War cast up their men of bronze and steel.

MAN'S LAUGHTER EXPLAINED ANEW

WHY do we laugh? The subject of laughter is a puzzling problem to philosophers and psychologists. Many theories have been put forth to explain the problem, but no single explanation seems to satisfy every one. Herbert Spencer, the English psychologist, believed that laughter was merely an overflow of excessive nervous energy. That is why, according to Spencer's theory, thin, dried-up individuals so rarely laugh—they have so little surplus energy—whereas the proverbial fat man is shaken with laughter at the slightest provocation.

Henri Bergson, the famous French philosopher, thought that laughter was evolved by the human race for the purpose of social discipline. No one likes to be laughed at. To be laughed at is to be made to feel ridiculous and small. Thus, to avoid being laughed at we avoid being awkward, unusual, eccentric, grotesque. We adhere to proper social form and usage.

One of the latest, and perhaps the most complete, theories of laughter has been propounded by Professor William MacDougal of Harvard University. Professor MacDougal sums up his explanation in the short sentence: "Laughter is the antidote to sympathy."

In other words, nature evolved laughter as a protection against the excessive working of the instinct of sympathy. The method by which laughter accomplishes this protection is twofold: physiological and psychological. First, laughter immediately increases the rate of breathing and stimulates the blood circulation, causing a greater flow of blood to the head and brain; secondly, it breaks up any trend of thought that may be going on at the moment. It therefore causes a complete suspension of effort, both physical and mental. The result is that you are carried away from thinking of any particular situation that would otherwise depress you.

Lord Byron was one of the few poets of the past who understood very well this important purpose of laughter. "If I laugh at any mortal thing," he wrote, "'tis only that I may not weep!"

LOVE OF BATTLE SEES WAGNER THROUGH

New York's Senator-Elect Began Life in This Country as an Immigrant Boy Who Visioned the Heights and, by Persistent Effort, Reached Them—He Is Eager for New Fray

By MILDRED ADAMS

IT'S the fighting for a thing that gets you through." Thus Senator-elect Robert F. Wagner thrust out his philosophy of life, which probably lies close to the secret of his success.

Forty-one years ago he was a stocky, square-faced immigrant boy, landing from Weisbaden, Germany, on the strange pavements of Castle Garden. Today he holds the highest political office this land of his adoption can give him, the post of United States Senator.

His is our favorite story: the tale of the poor lad who becomes famous, of the newsboy who, without power or name or fortune, wins his way through to them all. Peculiarly American, it sums up the opportunities of this land and the desires of this people. There is only one flaw. The poor boy who becomes President must be born here; Bob Wagner's parents landed from the steerage eight years too late—so that politically he can never rise higher than the Senate.

In spite of his eight boyhood years in Germany, Justice Wagner carries no hint of foreignness in manner, speech or appearance. He wears, sometimes hidden, a Phi Beta Kappa key, given him by his college "for scholarly work in the Legislature and on the Bench." He is more typically a New Yorker than are many of New York's native sons. He absorbed the new existence and was absorbed into it. New York became his spiritual as well as his physical home.

Love of content, love of people—these seem to be the pass-words. It is when he thinks in terms of a battle, when his eyes light up, his voice vibrates, and he shoots out that thrusting forefinger that one gets a glimpse of the characteristics that put him where he is. Justice Wagner will talk quietly and simply of his boyhood struggles for an education, his record in State politics, his intentions when he gets to Washington. The moment he says reminiscently "That was a battle," or expectantly "That will be a battle," the quiet fades, and his face, which is essentially good-humored, watchful, almost sleepy (the eyes long and narrowed, the mouth wide and quiet), changes its whole character. The eyes grow rounder and flash as if there were an actual light behind them. The lines in his face deepen and move in quick shifts of expression.

Justice Wagner had to fight from the time he, the baby of the family, a German boy, with almost no English, entered Public School 83, up on 110th Street, until the day after he had broken the mystic power of Senator Wadsworth and taken away his title. Then, with a smile in which reality won over professional good humor, he said: "I'm going to take the rest of the afternoon off and sit in the park."

It is neither a joke nor a pose. There is a gray stone house occupied by a friend of his, a city park official. It looks out across the clear water of one of the reservoirs to the patterned branches of Autumn trees and the walls of the crowding city.

"A bunch of us go and sit there," he said simply, "and talk things over. We watch the squirrels and the children. Sometimes there are fish that jump. The air's good, and it is restful."

It is doubtful if he rests very often. Life is too busy and too interesting. Lack of money acted as a constant spur; the law was his profession; politics offered the way to the top—there was little time for weariness. He was filled with a restless energy; had to be moving.

Senator Robert F. Wagner.

Drawn From Life by E. J. Woolf.

The family had emigrated because America was the land of opportunity, and it was true that Bob was bright. The boy explained that the College of the City of New York was as free as the public school had been. There was no tuition to be paid; no schoolbooks need be bought. He could work in vacations and after hours to earn his clothes if the family income would go on stretching over family necessities a bit longer. At last his older brother, who had predeceded the family to this country and was working as a cook, figured ways and means. The decision was made. Bob should have his chance.

"Those were great days." The long eyes of the Senator-elect glowed with memories. "We went through hard times at home, but the boys in college never knew it. Summers I worked as hallboy at the New York Athletic Club. I bought neat clothes and kept them clean." His fingers fumbled with his striped tie, as if he were remembering bouts with gasoline and a hot iron.

"I did all the things there were to do in college. I worked with committees and school politics. They made me President of my class, and I debated a lot. I always liked it, and that was lucky for me, I needed it. The most important thing was that I learned how to work. The first year I was at the top of my class and the second year I was barely nosed out by another man. I guess it was a good thing. If I'd stayed at the top of my class they might have given me a tutorship or something, and set me to teaching. That would have been the end. I'd have been pocketed."

But the vigor shot back into his voice. "I played football, too. It was a fighting game in those days. What position? Oh, quarterback. You see"—he sat up quite straight—"I'm a small man."

For one moment there flashed in that room, cluttered with the paraphernalia of a political campaign, a vision of small men and their accomplishments, of the handicap they feel and the struggle they make to assert themselves against a lack of inches. More than a few of them have performed miracles and have triumphantly challenged what some psychologists call an inferiority complex with the grimly joyous fighting slogan: "The bigger they are the harder they fall."

Senator Wagner graduated from the College of the City of New York in 1898 and began his law course and his political career almost simultaneously. "One night"—he was back now in the early days—"I buttoned up my coat and went around to the Democratic Club in my district. I didn't know any one there, but I told them I'd like to join. I wrote a speech and learned it (everybody was making speeches), and one night they let me say it."

It was a famous time for saying trial speeches. Governor Smith was learning his early lessons then, and the late Charles Murphy, with the insight that made him a Tammany leader, picked both boys as worth watching. In 1905, five years after he had graduated "cum laude" from the New York Law School and started his own small office, Wagner won his first public political recognition—election to the State Assembly from the Yorkville district.

He stayed in the Legislature fourteen years. Three of them were spent in the Assembly and the other eleven in the Senate. He left only when elected to the Supreme Court bench. He was the Democratic leader of the Senate for eight years, and Acting Lieutenant Governor when Martin Glynn took the place of the impeached Governor Sulzer.

Of all the work he has done in twenty-one continuous years of public service, Justice Wagner takes most pride in the factory legislation that occupied so much turbulent time.

"That was a battle!" Again that characteristic phrase. The watchful eyes lighted, the head lifted, the quiet voice rang. "Two days after the Triangle fire I introduced a resolution calling for the appointment of a committee to investigate factory conditions throughout the State. I was made Chairman of the commission, and we set out to discover how things were. We investigated big factories and little ones; went into hours of labor, danger of machinery, sanitary provisions. Of course it's all old stuff now, but believe me"—he compelled attention with an outflung hand—"we uncovered a lot of things the State didn't know existed.

"Children, 6 years old and younger, working right along with their mothers in canneries. Women working twenty hours a day, and scared to admit it for fear they'd lose their jobs. Factories where stone dust was so thick no man could hold his job and live more than a few years. It took us a long time, but we got the facts and the photographs. We made a report that called for a reorganization of the entire body of factory legislation, and we put it over. It has made conditions a lot easier for working people."

Understanding people is as innate a part of Senator Wagner's make-up as is his enthusiasm for a struggle. He sees life first and foremost in terms of people, individuals. "The humanization of the processes of

ELEPHANTS TO STAR IN ASIATIC HALL

New Wing of American Museum Is Soon to Show Jungle Life In Native Settings

Indian Bengal Tiger for New Asiatic Hall of the American Museum of Natural History.

By DIANA RICE

AFRICA HALL, with its bronzes and jungle beasts, is to have a notable neighbor in the elephant group now in the making at the American Museum of Natural History. Today in the studio of the new Asiatic wing of the museum the first Indian elephants, brought to this country for the purpose, are having their elaborate toilettes arranged. They are being prepared for exhibition. As carefully brushed and adorned as reigning beauties, these giants of the plain haughtily greet the visitor forcing his entrance through the temporary partition that now shuts off their unfinished dressing room. In all the ignominy of scouring soaps and cleansing suds their dignity is still supreme. When ready the great beasts will be worthy companions of their handsome brothers that will stand in Africa Hall. They will have the place of honor in the centre of new Asiatic Hall, which will house the animals and birds of India and adjacent lands.

The studio in which denizens of India's mountains, forests and plains are being posed for their entrance to the museum stage looks like a dressmaker's atelier. Models of all shapes and sizes are standing about waiting to be dressed. Only these manikins, unlike those of Paris ateliers, are inanimate. Smocked artists with paint brush in hand clamber up high ladders to put the finishing touches to the elephant group. Scaffoldings and plaster casts of wild beasts litter a studio soon to be swept clean of all but embellishing features. For this studio is Asiatic Hall turned into a workshop.

Preparing for the Show

In one corner an expert craftsman is carefully stitching up the dress of a Sumatra buffalo so that when placed on the manikin form it will show no trace of needlework. A baby rhino is being tinted to match its mother. The visitor comes suddenly upon tiger cubs playing behind a pillar. A hiding antelope peeks round a screen. From dim shadows a benign-looking cow gazes across the room. But closer inspection and expert information disclose the fact that it is neither a benign nor a harmless cow. It is the gaur ox of Burma, fiercest of all India's bison.

The business of museum exhibits grows more elaborate each year. No longer is it a matter of a few stuffed birds and animals in glass cases—lifeless forms clinging to stiff wires and wooden pegs. Today the trick is to transplant the jungle, the forest, the little known plains inside the brick walls of modern exhibition buildings. Animals are studied in their native haunts that they may be assembled in more lifelike groups in artificial surroundings. Museums, say those who direct them, must present their pictures as dramatically and as naturally as the silver screen.

Development in methods of mounting animals and birds so that the creatures look as they do amid familiar scenes, has been rapid, but it is still progressing to further perfection. The painting of backgrounds, the arrangement of artificial foliage, rocks, water, the reproduction of remote districts formerly unknown to all save the initiate—all these have been accomplished. Artists now accompany expeditions to strange lands in order to make the sketches that are later put into permanent form. Technicians also go along to add their special knowledge to a museum family in the making.

Today's method of mounting wild life is one of many evolutions. Experts say that an elephant shot in India or Africa in the year 1926 A. D. may be dug up by archaeologists in the year 4926 A. D. in a perfect state of preservation. That is, if its hide is treated in the new method now being developed by scientists concerned with such matters. The old method of mounting an elephant on a clay dummy, which in a few years cracks and falls apart, has gone into the discard. Today, lastingly enthroned on a highly complicated wire and wooden framework by technicians who are also artists, the giant quadruped will look as natural after a century spent in a museum as the day he left his jungle. Science has triumphed once more with a saving to posterity of valuable specimens. Ten years ago, Carl Akeley first tried the method now practically perfected. It is being used on the Indian elephants in Asiatic Hall.

Where Elephants Differ

To most people an elephant is an elephant. But after a visit to the workshop the visitor departs with the impression that there are as many varieties of elephants as there are pickles. There are not, as a matter of fact, but there are many points on which elephants differ. Indian elephants have a smoother skin and smaller ears than their African brothers. The Indian female elephant has no tusks, while the African female elephant has. The latter has a hollow or saddle back. The Indian species sports a hump. Full-grown African elephants measure more than eleven feet from ground to top of shoulder, while elephants from India measure about nine feet. These are but a few of the dissimilar features, most of them too technical for the tired business man who goes to the museum, as he goes to the movies, for diversion.

And that is what the American Museum of Natural History is aiming to do today—afford diversion, as well as scientific information, to the public. In the placing of the new elephant group in its most lifelike pose museum authorities aim to tell a story as they do in the jumping kangaroo postured against scenes taken from the country where kangaroos thrive, in the awkward polar bear outlined against his snow fields and ice cakes, in the frightened gazelle fleeing from a ravenous enemy. One will be able to journey from North America through Arctic regions to Asian plains in an hour or so when the new annex opens its doors.

Far removed from the studio where the elephant is cast for his first public appearance is the region he knows best. Natives learned in the ways of the elephant accompany scientists into the wilds of Africa and Asia on these hunts. With ears looking like huge lily pads thrown out from his body he charges off in an opposite direction long before the enemy comes in sight. With the tip end of his trunk he scents his familiars. He prefers black men to white. It is the native that helps the white man bag his prey. It is the native that helps him dissect his quarry for shipment across the ocean.

Under scientific direction it is prepared for its long journey. The specimen comes to these shores in three sections—head and two body pieces. The skin is carefully kept moist and rolled scientifically. The skull, pelvis and leg bones are preserved for exhibition purposes. They are not utilized in making the dummy, as is generally believed. Immediately an elephant is shot, his measurements are taken. These are used in making the armature over which the skin is eventually adjusted. The first mounting is made of wire and plaster of paris. Over this the skin is laid on. Then on top of the skin goes a heavy coating of plaster. When this plaster is dry the elephant is again divided into three parts—head and two body sections. These pieces are spread out on the floor and the plaster of paris and wire are removed from the inside. The shell of skin is now ready for the permanent framework. This consists of several layers of steel wire cloth on which light woodwork supports are placed. The three pieces are again put together and the skin is joined round the neck, down the backbone and underneath the body. The painting and tinting of the skin, after the plaster is removed, is a story in itself. A live elephant accidentally blundering into the studio where stands his inanimate brother would see him as he last appeared in their domestic retreat.

Elephants That Last

"It's as permanent as bronze," said Louie Jonas, who is making this group for the new hall. Mr. Jonas is a sculptor as well as a scientist, and works from a small clay model made from the two Indian elephants that were presented to the American Museum of Natural History by Arthur S. Vernay and Colonel J. C. Faunthorpe, both well known for their bags of big game. The mounted beasts will be placed in the large hall of the new wing exactly as they appear in the miniature replica reproduced on this page.

According to artistic ideals, the Indian elephant is more statuesque than other species—has stronger lines and finer curves. He lends himself more happily to sculptured forms. He is, in fact, the model used for nearly all sculptured groups of elephants. The two giants from India at the American Museum are said to be particularly fine specimens.

WAGNER'S LOVE OF BATTLE

government," is his pet phrase for the things he works for in politics. Justice Wagner has faith and interest and understanding. He thinks of himself, not as a person with exceptional abilities, but as one of the great mass of folk — one who, "through the opportunities and the tolerance and the fairness of America," was able to reach a position in which he could serve others.

In these days of sophistication and flippancy it is a peculiarly sturdy, unstudied and sincere attitude, having about it neither cant nor hypocrisy, but a certain simple literalness that glows in curious contrast to the canny politician he becomes when other canny politicians enter the room. Justice Wagner has a touch of the steadfast German idealism of an older age hidden away beneath his mask of political experience and his shield of practical habit in getting things done. "We've got to render public service," he exclaimed vehemently, almost as if he feared he would not be believed.

Fifty laws revolutionizing the State labor legislation followed his work on the Factory Investigation Commission. He was one of six men who drafted the Workmen's Compensation lawe of New York, regarded by experts as almost model legislation. The Civil Service act, the Child Labor law and the Corrupt Practices act owe much to his services. He was a steadfast friend of woman suffrage after he had watched the fine work of the women who labored on and for the Factory Commission.

Grateful to His College

The debt of gratitude he always feels for the school which gave him his higher education, the College of the City of New York, Justice Wagner paid in part by putting through a law that guarantees it enough tax money to secure it against want in times of possible political neglect.

When Justice Wagner left the Legislature for the bench of the Supreme Court he entered an atmosphere of comparative peace. He was advanced to the Appellate Division and his record as Judge is enviable. But Bob Wagner, the fighter, was far from being subdued by the robes and the quiet authority of Wagner, the jurist. Now that he is out of that office he admits that, much as he appreciated the honor of his position, much as he realized the value in human life of the slow upward march of judge-made laws, he was "spoiling for a little more action."

"I wanted to get out and do things." The broad shoulders were moved impatiently. "I wanted to be putting something through."

Finally word came along that his party wanted him to make the Senatorial fight against Wadsworth.

"I knew it was a gamble," he confessed," but I certainly did like the idea. And who do you think urged me on? The Democratic women!" he pounded the arm of his chair. "Lots of the men came sliding around to tell me I'd be a fool to quit the bench. It was too big a gamble. Wadsworth was too strong. I had everything to lose and might not win anything. But the women! They said: 'Go to it. It will be a great fight, and we'll every one of us work for you.' And they did!" He glowed over the memory of the campaign won against such long-standing odds.

The Senator-elect finds most of his interests and amusements within the wide scope of his public career. He plays golf, however, both for exercise and for recreation. Music he loves, though he claims not to understand it. His religious allegiance is divided. Born a Lutheran, he was taken by boyhood friends in his Yorkville neighborhood to the Sunday school of the Chelsea Methodist Church, and much of his youthful social life centred in church suppers and strawberry festivals. His wife, who has been dead for some years, was a Catholic, and his son has been brought up in that faith.

Bob Jr. is a husky young 16-year-old lad, taller than his father, and a student at Taft School in Watertown, Conn. He and the Senator-elect are wonderful friends, and Bob Jr. looks forward eagerly to spending vacations with his father in the simple six-room flat on the corner of Second Avenue and Eighty-sixth Street.

"I've lived there for years, and I like it," observed Justice Wagner. "It suits my tastes. The elevated? No, I never pay any attention to it, except when there's a tie-up and no trains run. Then the silence bothers me."

He resigned from the bench when he was nominated for Senator, and now, during slack time between election and taking office, Justice Wagner will resume the practice of law. He is eager to take up his Senatorial duties, and rebels against the archaic rule (passed in the days when it took three weeks to go on horseback from New York to Washington), that makes it necessary for a Senator to wait until the following March before being inducted into office. It will be December, 1927 (unless a special session is held), before he can take his seat in the Senate.

"The people elected me now because of certain present issues," Justice Wagner protested. "Next year the whole thing may be changed. Perhaps they won't want me in Washington then." But his tone was not really convincing.

Two things appeal to him now as vital necessities in Washington: modification of the Volstead law, along the lines laid down by the wording of the New York State referendum, and some such reorganization of Federal bureaus and departments as Governor Smith effected in New York State. On foreign policies he admits little settled opinion, though he has been spending the last four Summers in Europe and has been quietly absorbing impressions and information.

Justice Wagner's parting words concerned the reorganization of Federal departments, a necessity with which he is much concerned. "That's a job. It won't be easy. Every man with a salary of his own or an office to give away will kick. But it's got to be done, and the only way to do it is on a big scale, free from all idea of patronage. Some one's got to do it. I'd like to think it might be I."

CHANGING FASHIONS IN SCHOOL BAGS

IT is not difficult to trace to its source the mandate that hats are to be larger or skirts shorter or trousers broader, but who is the dictator in school bags? Who takes the dinner pail from the hand of the child and puts in it a gayly painted flat tin box?

In the early days children carried their books to school in bags made of strips of rag carpet, this material being replaced later on by the lighter bag of burlap. With the carpet rag bag there was carried a dinner pail that was a dinner pail, seeking no disguise and knowing the need of none. Then followed the era of the crocheted lamp mat, which, when completed and spread on the parlor table, gave the lamp the appearance of standing in a field of moss. A little of this decoration splashed over to the school bag, which now appeared in yarn of many colors.

Red was red in those days, and green was green; when red was not red, and green was not green, the substitutes were called "faded." The women who used the crochet hook would have nothing to do with them. So the school bag, bobbing along on the road, was never of an uncertain color.

A familiar sign in the subway came into existence following the advent of straps as a substitute for a bag. With high school books strapped and buckled together, a boy flung off to school feeling that he was the last word in fashion. Today mother takes her children to the store and they select with discriminating taste a juvenile brief case, often exactly like father's.

The Imported ROLLS RAZOR

A NEW RAZOR has come to town! Already famous in England, the ROLLS RAZOR began tackling some of America's most distinguished and toughest beards last Spring.

And—what a revelation in genuine shaving delight! With actual economy thrown in for good measure.

Never Such Shaves Before

"I've had nine six months," says a Wall Street man who always used a fresh wafer blade every day. "It has already saved me $14.22! But the important part is the way it shaves! I've never had such uniformly good shaves in my life—never felt or looked so 'well-groomed' without going to a barber shop. No more wafer blades for me—I'm 'sold' on the hollow-ground blade for life, just as Dad was, only mine combines the advantages of both the safety and the hollow-ground razors. And strops itself every time I take it out of the box! It cost a lot more at first, but it's cheaper in the long run."

This Means Shaving 30 Days for 20 Cents!!!

A Twelve-Dollar Shave Every Day

Discover This for Yourself!

That's the secret which has made the Rolls Razor famous among the fastidious. Coupon below brings it to you. Try it a Week and discover the sensation of enjoying a Twelve-Dollar shave every day! No more "agony" at the beginning of those evenings when you want to look specially fit. No more grief from bad wafer blades. No more blades of any kind to buy. The smooth delight of a hollow-ground blade with an edge like new every day—one blade guaranteed in writing to last 5 years.

Real Stone Honing

There never has been sharpness to equal the good old hollow-ground blade honed on real stone, then stropped on soft-cut leather. That's exactly the way the Rolls Blade is sharpened—the stone and the leather are part of its handsome hammered silver box. A few strokes as you take it from the box each morning and—its shave is a caress! For yourself or as a gift—there's none that compares with it.

CLEMENCEAU SEEKS THE TRUTH ABOUT LIFE

enceau's university thesis upon "The Generation of Anatomic Elements" was followed by a translation of Mill's book on Comte and a prolonged journey to the United States, where Abraham Lincoln presided over the Government and most people believed in democracy. It seems fair to assume that his point of view, if not his philosophy, became established for good during these years.

The gauge, the predilections—the limitations, if you will—of the scientific mind, whose touchstones are physical laws, experience and reason, form the basis of M. Clemenceau's consideration of all the phenomena of life. There is not a trace of mysticism, of religion, of any hope in forces commonly called supernatural. "The absolute truths are hopelessly contradictory," and the relative truths are such that "we dare not expect from them the great light in the expectation of which we have lived." The sand, the sea and the stars are all parts of the "chain of elements from which my own history has issued." But all one gets are fleeting glimpses of the stars thus related to us, "and at night, under my lamp, the tragic blinking of the lighthouses suddenly dazzles me, only to blind me immediately afterward with a darker night."

"On the faith of the sacred books of the man-child we believed ourselves the centre of the world. Mentally, the error is dissipated. But in the depths of our ancestral impulses, will it ever be?" To accommodate ourselves to the world, that is, to our destiny, "like every organism, every element of the universe," requires an exceptional effort on the part of men "so blinded in regard to themselves as to desire, like the legendary king, to give orders to the ocean." But this, according to the "Tiger," is what wisdom counsels us to do.

Do we seek security, a solid foundation on which to build in a world full of illusion? Then we should "throw out our anchor upon the rocks of knowledge." "Each passing day brings me proof of a renewing of myself through the activity of the understanding. . . . I do not know much, but of what I know I accept proudly the consequences. . . . I hear it said that the noble joys of the scholar can never be the lot of any but a small number, and that, if one is not careful, the egoistic avidity of the effort to learn will dry up the sources of the happy ignorance from which proceed miraculously so many vigorous manifestations of impulse. The more we know, according to some, the less we can feel, thus losing the best part of ourselves—as though feeling and knowledge did not complete each other instead of conflicting.

Seeks No Paradise

"I seek paradise neither upon earth nor in the skies. . . . Since we are only a momentary manifestation of cosmic elements, it is for us to seize from our moment of existence all that it contains of human nobility, the product of centuries that have not even the significance of a hammer stroke in eternal time. . . . We know nothing of the world save the relations of its organism to ours, which is one of the functions of its sensitivity. If our function does its work normally, we shall have realized the just measure of our life. But if we demand from ourselves more than the cosmos has placed in us, we shall mar the machinery, like a child who moves the hands of his watch to make the time to suit himself."

Within these limitations, life is a high and joyful adventure for him who takes it rightly. Man is mortal, his intelligence is "an organic state." But with it he can do a great deal. "Life is an opportunity to dare." There is imposed upon us an implacable law of living, amended by "changing formations of a personality which the growth of conscious feeling raises above the unconscious from which it came." What more can one ask for the measure of a brief existence? "I am free to live as to die, armed with a sovereign power over myself by virtue of my personality. . . . So as not to obtain less, try to get from yourself more than is possible. But don't defy yourself for that. 'He who tries to be an angel becomes a beast.'"

Seldom has there been as impressive an instance of the honest and persistent application of reason—which Clemenceau regards as the anchor of existence—as that of his own behavior in relation to the Dreyfus case. At first he thought the Captain guilty, accepted the verdict of the court-martial and bitterly denounced the offense. When he was told that there were serious douhts, he asked for evidence. He soon decided that, guilty or not, Dreyfus had not had a fair trial. Accumulating facts supported this view, and it was Clemenceau who printed in his paper, L'Aurore, the famous letter of Zola called "J'Accuse"—Clemenceau having written the title.

Development of Individual

It is almost superfluous to refer to his greatest fight of all, the climax of his career, that began when at the age of 76 he took charge of the French Government in the midst of a desperate war, and that ended two years later with the completion of the Treaty of Versailles. It was the culmination of half a century of political activity. What does this veteran of parliaments and ministries think of politics in general, of the possibility of intelligent and just government?

He is not encouraging. He believes that the best government would be one that devoted itself to the development of the individual, "the decisive factor in all civilized progress." But that is not so much a question of speeches or laws as of the general will, which is more disposed to shout its wants than to translate them into acts. If each person should some day learn to govern himself "it would be because an evolution superior to man had suddenly revealed itself." "Until then we must trust to accidental realizations of idealism or to some intervention of genius. And genius sometimes costs more than it is worth; look at Alexander, Caesar, Napoleon and the heritage that they have left us."

M. Clemenceau has no illusions and few hopes in regard to democracy. "If the average man should ever rise—and that will not be without difficulty—above the infantile bait of reward in contrast to punishment," he would be able to accept great sacrifices for an idea. But the crowd "clings to banal formulas, without much troubling itself as to their application," and "the attainment of a momentary community of opinion faces so many obstacles that one cannot expect to accomplish it without an amount of time impossible to calculate. . . . The crowd will give itself to an act of faith rather than undertake to understand on the basis of documents of experience. Its 'Yes' will be of the catechism and not of the laboratory. . . .

"Public opinion is as unstable as a feather in the wind. Autocracy and democracy proceed from quite opposing conceptions, to resolve themselves generally into the formation of oligarchies grouped around a monarch or a Demos with a thousand heads, for which popular oligarchies substitute themselves, with results that have not appreciably changed since Aristophanes."

Parliaments do no more than disperse effort when what is needed is unity of will. Under whatever names, governing oligarchies are founded upon "the satisfaction of social interests that claim all that they dare beyond what is their due. . . . Fascism and the Soviets, governments of chance whose principal advantage is the lack of any theory, show to what point of intellectual dissolution classical democracies can come to in the hands of oligarchies. . . .

"Men for action. Parliaments for control. That is too simple to be generally practiced. Autocracies and their oligarchies have decidedly failed. Under various forms the oligarchies of democracy are generally on trial. To the abuse of personal authority they may oppose or add the abuse of an irresponsible anonymity that may end by changing the names of the opposing camps."

As to the prospect of abolishing war, M. Clemenceau is no more sanguine. He does not commit upon the view—expressed by H. G. Wells in "The World Set Free," and now rather widely accepted—that the perfection of instruments of slaughter will make war so devastating that it will have to be done away with. Nor does he discuss the practicability of such types of international economic cooperation as that upon which the Briand-Stresemann rapprochement program is predicated. But he regards war as a product of human instincts and social behavior which it will take a long time to change; he apparently regards war as normal.

"You can examine all the ages of history. You will find there only rhythms of peace and war, of the preaching of human charity and the exultation of cruelty. The fatigue of war leads to peace; the fatigue of peace loosens war. . . . Too long have our histories gathered nothing but ebundant tales of successions of wars and battles. It is really in our time that history has discovered peace. . . .

"The impulses of war are everywhere more active and more romantic than the bookish conception of a universal peace among peoples who so far have found themselves in agreement only in the propensity for mutual massacre. Consider the manifestations of art in all the countries of the world; everywhere there prevail representations of warriors honored by monuments, statues, paintings, poems and populer songs."

Abdication of Freedom

What would the nations have to do to establish an enduring régime of peace? This is a point that has been neglected, according to M. Clemenceau. "It involves nothing less than demanding that the great nations that have so far governed the world, hy imposing more or less openly their wills and their interests, should abdicate their independence."

But the former Premier does not urge the abandonment of all attempts to prevent war, nor does he insist that the only prospect is en indefinite prolongation of the existing situation. "We must choose between two ideas of civilization, one of which expecte progress from a slow advance of altruism. . . . while the other devotes itself to changee of procedure that leave the basic atavism untouched beneath a mask of words. .

"Our laws universally bring men into conflict, since individual gain is the condition of our existence. We talk of economic war. That is the true name of your peace, which is only another form of war. . . . which adds to the resources and vitality of the strong. . . . As to the rivalry of the peoples to advance in the course of civilization, I suggest that we hope for some good from that noble emulation. But to tell the truth, I am not eure. . . ."

The skepticism of the scientific mind now permeates and colors the "Tiger's" views of politics, of international affairs, of human progress. Of those generous, idealistic impulses that epurred on the young and radical Clemenceau to a career of active and distinguished public life, there remains at least the conviction that they were worth while. The man whose medical training and experimental philosophy caused him to subject himself to a rigid mental and physical régime, abjuring tobacco and alcohol, taking regular exercise, working hard but resting wisely, sticks by his guns; he believes that life, enlightened by knowledge and reason, in spite of disillusion and a large measure of futility, can achieve nobility and grandeur. What more can one ask of it?

THE RADIO 'BROADCATCHER' IS REVEALED

He Discloses His Likes and Dislikes to the Man Behind the Microphone and His Wishes Are Duly Heeded

By MAJOR GEN. J. G. HARBORD, President, Radio Corporation of America.

AMONG Radio's observations regarding the average American are such things as these:

He may not be religious in the sense of being a church worker or even of attending service regularly, but he is a vigorous defender of the faith he professes.

He may tell you that he has little use for the so-called "high-brow" music, but radio has proved that he has a great craving for it.

He may not vote—millions did not in the last election—but he will rise in wrath if a broadcast station appears to give "the other fellow" a little the best of it during a campaign.

He may be careless about his health, but be very careful how you tread upon his medical beliefs.

If I were to call in our director of broadcasting and ask him to tell me in the short sentences of the engineer what he has learned about the outstanding characteristics of the "broadcatcher" in more than four years before the microphone I know about what he would tell me.

"The radio listener has a chip on his shoulder," I can hear him say, in fact, I have heard him say it.

"He kicks," he will add.

Demands of the Listener

And then, after a pause:

"He wants what he wants when he wants it."

Finally, in strict honesty:

"The average listener is intelligently critical."

And that, of course, is the nub of the story, and one of our first and most important discoveries about you.

Those of us who have tried to guide this infant prodigy came to our work without established precedents. While nearly five million American families were "discovering" radio, we—of necessity—have had to learn a great deal about the interests, the tastes, the whims, the idiosyncrasies of these millions, who are invisible but not inaudible.

You, we have discovered, are ready to "take pen in hand" on the slightest provocation and indite a few words of criticism. But—and this is odd—you are quite as ready to write in about your appreciation. In fact, many times writing is too slow. If we have knocked the chip off your shoulder or stepped on the toes of your prejudices you reach for a telephone or for a telegraph blank; but you also do it, and spend hard money for the privilege, when we have pleased you. That seems to me a high test of interest.

Radio again has proved that ours is a sport-loving public. Even the farmer, who gets almost no opportunity to witness sports events, is an enthusiastic "fan" now that radio is here.

But it may surprise you to learn that in the aggregate fandom does not want much sport broadcast. The radio listener wants his daily sport diet first hand, or from his newspaper, he tells us, but give him the Yale-Harvard football game, the world series, the great boat race, or the championship fight. He wants only the very best athletic events broadcast.

Of the sports, football has had the most amazing leap in general popularity. Where football interest formerly was chiefly collegiate, all classes now follow it as the announcer's voice pictures the struggle and suspense of the play. I have often thought that the popularity of football by radio may be due to the fact that the listener, following play by play, imagines himself out there on the white-lined gridiron, squirming, dodging, racing through a broken field and performing deeds of strength and valor such as he has no opportunity of performing in the humdrum daily life.

However, it is a dark day for the station director if he picks a poor sports event for broadcast. If you attend a great fight and the fighters are not evenly matched, the excitement of the ringside may in some degree gloss over the fact. But the voice of the accurate announcer relentlessly tells the story of blow after blow and the radio listener "sees" the fight clearly in all its defects. I do not know whether the listener writes to the promoter responsible for a poor fight, but it is certain that he is likely to write to his broadcast station about it.

Although we have heard much discussion of the churches, their attendance and support, the broadcasting of services has been so popular as to indicate a strong religious influence in the country. However, if we put a Methodist on the air tonight we must follow up quickly with a Presbyterian, and so on down the line. Radio must have a balanced religious program.

I often think that we like to pretend to be a little more "common" or "rough-necked" than the facts warrant. The other day I noticed a boy come trudging around a corner whistling an air I did not at first place; then I realized it was Anitra's Dance from "Peer Gynt." A generation or so ago boys whistled "A Hot Time." That tells a story.

American jazz swept around the world; then along came radio and gave us all kinds of music. No one has been more amazed than have radio leaders to discover how much of the so-called "long-haired music" Americans will enjoy—and ask for more.

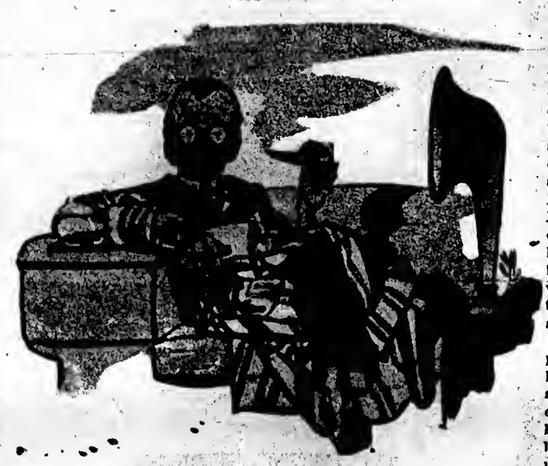
Our investigations show that less than 10 per cent. of our listeners want "jazz" today. Consequently, in the "home of jazz" this product hitherto considered typically American is being kept off our program until 10 o'clock.

Some time ago it was announced that the cancer germ had been isolated. Our book of experience shows you have a great interest in science, yet we would hesitate to put on a lecture about this reported discovery. If we did thousands might rise to protest that the thing had not yet been proved. If a man gives a scientific or medical interview to the newspapers that is contrary to your beliefs you pass it by; but let that same man speak the same words over the radio and you promptly resent it. He has forced his way into your home with his ideas, and you do not like that.

We find that you do not like to have medical lectures thrust down your throat, but you have praised practical health talks. You have shown very clearly that you do not, generally, like to be "preached at," and yet a debate between two nationally known ministers over a religious controversy was a big radio event. Although we have established a general rule that you "do not like speeches," it is equally true that a speech by the President, by a Presidential candidate, or by a lesser personage if of a vital issue, will cause millions to tune in expectantly.

During a campaign you may like to stand on a street corner and damn your political opponent, but you will burn up the telegraph wires with protests if we let a political candidate do any of it over the radio—though it has been a profitable political pastime for a century or more for stump speakers. Again, perhaps it is because we do not permit a voice in our living room the privileges we accord a man being interviewed for a newspaper or making a public speech.

You have somewhat the same objection to any attempt that may be made to tell you what and where to buy. During a trip to South America I noted that "direct advertising" is put on the air there, sandwiched in between numbers of the broadcast program. In this country that would be a splendid way of reducing sales. The man or woman who pores over magazine advertising is instantly offended if his loud-speaker starts telling him where to buy and what. A twirl of the dial and the listener goes elsewhere for program. And he will go elsewhere to purchase goods.



The Radio "Broadcatcher."

Of any ten persons who might be selected at random and questioned regarding their radio tastes, eight or nine might say off-hand that they do not want "instruction"; they had enough of "education" in their schooldays and there are already enough troublesome "facts" in their lives. But our broadcast directors know that the acts of this 80 or 90 per cent. belie their words.

If you want instruction of a certain sort you will be ready and waiting for it at the program hour. Thousands of letters tell radio stations what you want, and every cautious experiment in finding out what the public wants in the way of science, art, music, history, psychology and kindred subjects, popularly presented, has resulted in our giving such "serious" things a bigger place in our programs.

"Instruction" Is Resented

But we know that you do not want us to intrude into an entertainment hour with "instruction." The listening appreciates incidental "human interest" facts. An announcer may tell that the number next on the program was written by the composer in honor of his wife and played by an orchestra in the hallway of their home on the morning of their birthday. But if the announcer goes much further than that in instructing the invisible audience about the porgram we may get letters expressing displeasure.

Radio has proved agin that we are all "mighty human." That we do not grow up—very much. The radio audience, regardless of age, like striking stunts. The animals in a circus sending a bedlam of noises over the ether wave ranks way up in front in broadcast popularity. Aviation manoeuvres described, while the hum of engine and roar of dropped bomb is audible, becomes adventure for the listener. And radio is an adjunct to hero worship; there is a thrill in hearing the voice of a famous person.

Finally, there is another strange angle to the radio situation and to the relation between radio and its public. The men who first made automobiles and bicycles did not furnish good roads to ride upon, nor the phonograph makers free records, but the "broadcatcher" looks to the broadcaster to furnish entertainment; as the life-termer said about his sentence, "from now on."

Our public, fed on a diet of miracles, demands that the diet be continued.

NEW STRONG MAN HOLDS HALF OF CHINA

Chiang Kai-shek, Leader of the Cantonese Revolutionists, Extends His Sway by a Series of Unexpected Victories

By LEWIS S. GANNETT.

CHINA has a new strong man, a new conquering general. The old names fade, and out of the South comes, almost heralded, Chiang Kai-shek, leader of revolutionary Canton's armies. In less than three months, starting from the isolated province of Canton, own toward the Equator where ranges grow, he has led his little army a thousand miles to the north, across mountain passes that have no railway and hardly any road; wiped out Wu Pei-fu, who had been one of China's big men for five years, and captured Hankow and Wuchang, the great industrial cities in the heart of China. Today he is master of half of China. In all the long centuries of Chinese history there is no parallel for this amazing series of sudden victories.

The first and most extraordinary thing about Chiang Kai-shek, as a Chinese military leader, is that he would refuse to accept any interpretation of his successes in terms of his own character. He represents a party, and his Kuomintang soldiers, trained in a school of politics as well as in a military academy, are like nothing else in China. When I asked him what he thought of Feng Yuh-hsiang, the Christian General whose Northwestern army flirts with the Nationalists in the South, he answered: "You cannot tell anything about an army by looking at its General. You must look into it, and see what kind of men makes up the ranks." I doubt whether such an answer would have occurred to any other of China's thousand generals.

A Modest General

If you go to see Chang Tso-lin, the war lord of Manchuria and Peking, he will receive you like a king, dressed in fine robes, in a throne room hung with tiger skins; Wu Pei-fu affects the part of the genial classical scholar (always a sympathetic rôle in China) and lives surrounded by friends and underlings. Sun Chuan-fang receives visitors in a magnificent yamen in Nanking with bugles blowing. Six lines of soldiers were drawn up at salute to greet us when, with the American Consul, I called on Sun, and all was pomp and ceremony. When I went to see Chiang Kai-shek in Canton I presented my card at the door of an inconspicuous two-story modern dwelling house; the boy studied it and silently pointed upstairs. At the top of the stairs I met a pleasant-looking young man in an officer's uniform without distinguishing marks of rank.

"Where Chiang Kai-shek?" I asked in simplified English.

"Yes, Chiang Kai-shek," the young man replied.

"Where, where Chiang Kia-shek?" I repeated, puzzled.

The young man pointed to a bedroom; I entered and sat down. A moment later Chen Tsu-yen, a former Lehigh University student, came in and explained that the pleasant young officer was the Commander-in-Chief himself. The bare bedroom was his; it was also his workroom. The inevitable tea appeared, also a plate of hard candies, and another of exceedingly stale rice cakes. The General ate nothing, and instead of tea he sipped hot water. Most of the time he sat erect, his folded hands on the table before him. There was no bombast about him, hardly any gesture, but he had a quiet dignity, and—a quality rare in Chinese, rare enough anywhere—he smiled as he spoke. A tall, slight man under 40, there was nothing in his appearance to mark him as a leader of men; his high forehead, which seemed higher because of his close-cropped head, his delicate features and small-boned hands seemed rather to indicate the scholar-type.

I asked him, when we began our interview, for a short autobiography, and he wrote it out as the interpreter translated his remarks into English. But it looked very brief in Chinese characters, and the interpreter reduced it to this simple chronicle:

"Born in Chekiang Province, educated at Paotingfu Military Academy and in Japan, with Sun Yat-sen since the revolution." Later I gleaned a few facts to fill the chinks. He was born in 1888 in a tiny village near Feng-wha; his father died when he was a baby, and his mother brought him up among her relatives, who were Ningpo tradesmen. In 1906 he won one of the forty Chekiang scholarships to the new national military academy, where the decaying Manchu dynasty was trying, too late, to build a modern Western-style army. A year later his instructors sent him on to study further in Japan. Those were the days, just after the Russo-Japanese War, when thousands of Chinese crossed the Yellow Sea to study in Nippon; they still counted the Mikado's people as brothers, of their own race.

The revolution of 1911 called him home, with others of China's young enthusiasts. The republic gave him command of a brigade of Shanghai troops, and for a time he drilled them conscientiously. But he lost interest, and for two years he lived the life of a typical old-style Chinese officer. He drank, he gamed, he frequented sing-song houses; sometimes he would be away for weeks. Those were disillusioning days for ardent young men; Yuan Shih-kai was molding the republic into something very like a new monarchy. Leader of vain revolutionary movements for decades, Sun Yat-sen, Yuan's predecessor in the presidency, raised the standard of revolt in 1913; Chiang joined him, and ever since his destinies have been intimately linked with those of the "father of the republic."

For ten years he was a minor officer—his only outstanding achievement being a venture in speculative exchange, which, according to the stories, netted him a million dollars, all of which he turned over to Dr. Sun. Finally, in 1923, Dr. Sun appointed him head of the new Whampoa Military Academy, across the river from Canton. Dr. Sun had tried, all through that decade, to make Canton the base for a real revolution in China. Sometimes he had seemed to make progress; but always he had been compelled to depend upon unreliable mercenary troops. In 1922 Dr. Sun, disgusted by the joint demonstration of the foreign fleets before the Canton Custom House, turned to Russia for help. Russia was only too glad to assist; Chiang Kai-shek went to Moscow for a few months' study, and Michael Borodin went to Canton. Borodin has had much to do with the subsequent successes of the Canton Government. Russia later sent military experts to assist Chiang at Whampoa, and the foreigners in Canton believe that she also sent guns and ammunition. The fear which most foreigners in China feel for the Canton group is largely due to this acceptance of Russian aid.

Out of Whampoa has grown Chiang's national success. With the aid of General Gallant (one of Borodin's assistants) and a small subsidy he trained a corps of boys to be officers in China's future Nationalist Army. He insisted upon boys—no one over 25 need apply. And he built up a corps of lads ready to die for China and Sun Yat-sen and Chiang Kai-shek. He trained them to shoot straight and to goose-step. And he also drilled them in the "Three People's Principles" which are the basis of what, since the leader's death, has become known as Sun Yat-senism.

The Three Principles are variously translated. The Mayor of Canton, son of old Wu Ting-fang, so long the Chinese Minister to Washington, says they mean government of, by, and for the people. Others define them as nationalism, democracy, and socialism. But China is a long, long way from democracy or socialism today, and essentially they are understood as the expression of the democratic nationalist movement which has so stirred the youth of China. Dr. Sun ended his life in a blaze of popularity because his last years were devoted to a passionate campaign to rouse China to smash the "unequal treaties" which give the white foreigners their dominant position in the yellow man's country.

Chiang Kai-shek's name first floated into familiarity in the treaty ports of the North last year when he routed Chiang Ching-ming, who had long held the northern half of Canton Province, and forced him to flee on a warship. While in the North he discovered a conspiracy in his capital. His little force abandoned the cities they had just won, turned homeward and routed the mercenaries who had taken possession of Canton in their absence, then retraced their steps and in another brilliant campaign defeated Chiang Ching-ming a second time, storming Waichow, a walled and fortified city which had never been captured by storm since the Tang Dynasty, a thousand years before.

Chiang's Dare-to-Die Corps dashed single file through a narrow opening in the face of machine-gun fire, leaving hundreds behind but capturing the town. Military science in China is a game like chess, and the players usually obey the rules; Chiang defied the rules, outraging his adversaries but winning the day. Some give the credit to his Russian advisers.

Chiang is a moody, tempestuous soul. He has proved himself as an administrator, but his nerves fray. Every few months he is likely to vanish from Whampoa, and rest his soul in some Buddhist retreat in the mountains. But for six months after storming Waichow he devoted himself to building up an officers' corps for Canton's armies. There were relics of a dozen mercenary bands in the province, nominally loyal to the Kuomintang Party Government which Chiang had helped install, but really loyal only to the leaders who paid them. Chiang filtered his Whampoa cadets into these armies, and sent civilian missionaries of Sun Yat-senism to preach the nationalist gospel. Most Chinese troops, when captured, turn about and fight for their conquerors; Chiang refuses to incorporate such uncertain units and boasts that his own soldiers are so thoroughly indoctrinated that if any of them are captured they will, instead of fighting for their adversaries, set about converting them.

A Victorious Army

At any rate, Chiang's Whampoa-trained troops have walked through every army with which they have come in contact, and have won a reputation as men who are not afraid of fighting against odds. With half China already under their flag, and with sympathetic party units hoping for their advent in every city of the country, they and their leader are a force to be reckoned with.

"What do the Russians actually do here?" I asked Chiang Kai-shek.

He smiled, but all he said was, "We employ some of them to help in technical training of various kinds."

Later, he added: "Ours is part of a world revolution, and we can use people from any nation if they sympathise with and are ready to serve our nation. Russia, in general, has treated China better than the other nations. She has given up extra-territoriality, renounced territorial ambitions, and canceled her unequal treaties, and we like the Russians who have been here at Canton."

But two months later, by a sudden coup d'état, he rounded up most of the Russians in Canton and deposited them on an outbound ship. They had been playing too lively a part in stirring up extremism on board one of the ships of Canton's navy.

"What do you look forward to?" I asked him. "What will be the outcome of this Canton movement?"

"We will join with the Kuomintang members in other provinces and unite China," he answered briskly.

"That's a large order," I said.

"Yes, but we'll do it," came the reply. "We have just begun. Today for the first time since 1921 this Province of Canton is united. [This was in February.] It is the busiest and richest province in China, with more people in it than all England. We have proved our strength by boycotting British goods since the massacre on Shamien last June [when British and French machine gunners shot down fifty-three Chinese paraders] and patriots everywhere are looking to us. Three other provinces have already made overtures to us. Others will follow.

Announces

the formation of a Dancing Club-Class

FOR those New Yorkers who wish to dance but do not care to patronize the expensive night clubs or ordinary dance halls I am forming an exclusive Club-Class, the sort of place where one can come to dance and incidentally learn the newest steps in the Tango, Fox Trot, etc.

The Club-Class will meet one night a week for a period of four months. To the first fifty members the membership fee for the four months, including the two private lessons, will be surprisingly low.

My large staff of teachers will be on hand to assist and dance with the members. To be among the first fifty members it will be necessary for you to file your application now, in person, by phone or mail. Address Miss Johnson, Arthur Murray, 7 East 43d St. Vanderbilt 1778.

TANGO

Not until you have had lessons at Arthur Murray's studio have you learned the thrill of being sought after as a dancing partner. All the new steps may be mastered in a few hours from teachers who are sympathetic fault-finders.

BANBURY AND ITS CROSS

did other towns of that time, which was an evil time for churches. Having destroyed a beautiful church, Banbury built a hideous one, one about which clings another old rhyme: "Banbury's proud people built a church without a steeple." And Banbury became a laughing-stock, for it cost more to build an ugly church without a steeple than it would have cost to restore the beautiful one.

The little town of Banbury once nestled in the shadow of a mighty castle—a castle old as it was magnificent, having been built by Alexander, Bishop of Lincoln, in 1125. About this castle the town's history weaved. But the castle, too, has gone the way of nearly all of Banbury's noble monuments and is today completely lost—swallowed up in the dust of ages. It was razed shortly after the Wars of the Roses.

Today Banbury has once more embraced the spirit to destroy, and it is her best-known monument that now stands threatened. Aside from the objection of motorists it is pointed out that the present cross is not the "goodly crosse" of the poet and that it is not a pretty cross. Doubtless they said that High Cross and Weeping Cross of three centuries ago were not pretty. Excuses abounded when the castle was destroyed and when they blew up their church.

Town's Only Cross

The existing Banbury Cross was erected to commemorate the marriage of Queen Victoria's eldest daughter to the father of the ex-Kaiser. It is not, therefore, very old. But it is Banbury's only cross, and Banbury, of all places, ought to have a cross. Perhaps it is not, according to the tastes of today, beautiful. But it will always be beautiful in the eyes of children because of what it evokes. It is a part of the world of childhood.

Standing in the shadow of "Banbury Cross," in that incongruous old square where the twentieth century tries to shoulder the past into oblivion, one may well feel that Banbury is dead. If there is ever a traffic jam in the square around Banbury Cross it must be at a time when a celebration is on, or when some herder drives his flock through the sleepy town. The great white lion at the top of the White Lion Inn looks down upon the quiet streets. The oldest wistaria vine in England (it is said to be 230 years old) stretches its twisting tendrils and green leaves. Men quietly drink nut-brown ale from pewter mugs—they do not seem the sort of folk who would make a child cry; who would tear down Banbury Cross to please a handful of motorists.

Perhaps they will reconsider the decision and, listening to the voice of England, leave Banbury Cross in peace "on or near" the spot where stood the old cross of the poet.

On the present cross is the following inscription:

THIS CROSS
STANDS ON OR NEAR THE SITE OF THE ORIGINAL CROSS WHICH WAS DESTROYED IN
A. D. 1602
IN A TIME OF RELIGIOUS INTOLERANCE.

STRENUOUS EVICTION

THERE are old sayings about scuttling a ship or burning a barn to get rid of rats, but it has been reserved for a landlord at Liverat in France to tear down his house to get rid of human tenants. This landlord, a mason by trade, let his house to working people with whom he did not get on well and whom he vainly tried to evict. Finally the tenants returning home one evening found that a kitchen wall had been demolished. A notice was posted upon the wreckage stating that this was only the beginning of operations. This act of eviction, it is said, proved effective.

Could you go to Europe and speak well enough to be understood by customs and railway officials, hotel people, taxi-drivers, waiters? Everybody should be able to talk and read a foreign language—either for enjoyment in traveling, for general culture, or for business reasons. CAN YOU

Parlez-vous francais?
Sprechen Sie deutsch?
¿Habla usted espanol?
Parlate italiano?

If not, how would you like to learn quickly and easily the way children do?

A REMARKABLY simple new method of teaching languages now enables you to speak and read French, German, Spanish or Italian in a short time—without once translating or referring to a dictionary! Not a word of English in any lesson—yet you learn a foreign language at sight, and understand it!

This revolutionary method is based on the natural way in which children learn languages, by "mental absorption." You know how quickly a foreigner's child—even only five years old—will "pick up" English from his American playmates, and be speaking fluently while his parents are still struggling to express the simplest thoughts.

Well, the Pelman Method of Language Instruction is built upon the principle that this child uses instinctively. Just like a child learning to speak, you do not bother at first about grammar, syntax, or any of the other stumbling-blocks that make ordinary methods of language study so difficult and discouraging. Instead, you learn from the very first lesson how to use the language itself—you learn progressively how to say just what you want to say—you rapidly acquire the habit of using the new words, the meaning of which you understand at sight as you go along. When you can speak, read and understand others readily, then—and then only—you get the knowledge of grammar you need in a new, simple way, which makes it both easy and very interesting.

Why You Can Read Another Language At Sight

If somebody told you to read a foreign newspaper at sight you would probably say: "Impossible! Why, I don't know a word of any language but English!" Yet, amazing as it may seem, the fact is that you do actually know hundreds of words in French, Spanish, German and Italian which are almost identical with words in English.

What does this mean? Simply that you already have a start toward learning any foreign language you choose, by the simplest, most efficient method ever invented.

The Pelman Method is the only one which has ever made full use of this amazing fact, yet the similarity of words in the principal language is the obvious foundation of language teaching. Let us see how this revolutionary discovery works out in a specific case.

Suppose, for example, that you have decided to learn French. (The Pelman method works just as simply with other languages.) When you open the first lesson of the Pelman method, you will be surprised to see not a single word of explanation in English. But you soon realize that no English is necessary. You find that you already know enough French words to start—words that are almost the same in English—and that you can easily discover the meaning of the unfamiliar French words by the way they "fit in" with those you recognize at sight.

Speak Well and Understand Perfectly—In a Short Time

By means of this revolutionary system, within a short time you will be able to read books and newspapers in the languages you have chosen. Almost before you realize it, you will find yourself able to speak that language more fluently than students who have studied it for years in the toilsome "grammar first" way.

This is no exaggeration. In England, where this wonderful new method was originated, tens of thousands of people have found that it makes foreign languages astonishingly easy to learn. In America, this success was at once duplicated. It is by far the most practical and sensible way to learn French, Spanish, German and Italian.

One of the most valuable features of this system is that correct pronunciation and accent are taught from the very first lesson by a remarkable new invention that makes this part of your progress astonishingly easy.

Send for Free Book

This amazing free book, that is yours for the asking, shows you what a real cultural benefit, what a wonderful means for pleasure, it is to have another language at your command. This free book will give you a convincing demonstration of the method; it actually shows you that you can read, at sight, a page of the language you decide to learn. It shows why it is possible to guarantee that you will learn either French, Spanish, German or Italian within a short time, to your satisfaction, or it will cost you nothing. Can a fairer offer than that be made? Send for the book today. It costs you nothing. It places you under no obligations. No salesmen will call upon you. Mail the coupon at once.

A SARGASSO SEA OF CANES

Highly Wrought Abandoned Walking Sticks Go to Paris When Discarded by Owners

By WHIT BURNETT

WHEN an American from, let us say, Cedar City, arrives in Paris he takes one of two courses. He may either remain an American, rather boldly so, or try to become for a few weeks a Frenchman. In trying to be the latter he usually is more obviously the former. But in nine cases out of ten, whichever the choice, sense of leisure and a latent taste for elegance lead him to buy a walking stick.

What happens afterward to the cane is another problem. For few get back to Cedar City, or Boise, or San Diego. In New York one may promenade, stick in hand; further West the men get up in a street car under the impression that the cane-carrier is crippled.

Careful investigation reveals that on starting homeward some American tourists drop their canes at the pier. Some take them home and hang them on the wall, mementos of a hope for a leisurely maturity. There is a class that pawns them.

In this class is the carefree American who lands in Paris with a few hundred dollars and the hope that the franc will do everything but stabilize. His first investment is a first-class snakewood stick with a pale rose horn handle, symbol of an emancipation into a certain expansiveness. At the end of his traveler's checks he begins to eliminate luxuries.

Monsieur C. Tessier for sixteen years has operated probably the most distinctive cane collection shop in Paris. It is near the Café de la Rotonde, where in flush days the American gay livers congregate. If a temporarily embarrassed stick-bearer has a good cane, M. Tessier will buy it. He has bought canes from Germans and Africans, Russian Princesses and American sportsmen, English remittance men and Javanese dancers. A happy place to know of in case one can really do without one's stick, the recessive time having come.

To Mr. Tessier have come many almost priceless possessions. They date from as far back as six or seven hundred years ago, in the day of a vogue of heavy ebony batons that had served the chiefs of the Ivory Coast in Africa. Carved atop these rods are delightful motifs, women, an outstretched hand, various symbols. The Moroccans also have contributed canes, with metal tops and mysterious carvings. A Malay cane bears a fetich in the form of a dog-man.

Less primitive, more meticulous, are the examples from Japan, China and the Malay archipelago, where ivory, carved exquisitely, forms the handles. A Siamese cane is inlaid with pearl in a butterfly motif, and a Japanese example is an ivory mask fixed in the body of the malacca. A Madagascan cane of native wood employs horn for the handle, and an Afghan stick is inlaid with silver.

Other canes vary from the crude, vine-like sheep-goaders of a Corsican berger to a Polish stick crowned by a delicately carved patriarch whose beard flows down the rod in a gentle rhythm.

There are eight or ten canes of French monarchical eras — long, graceful canes made to be extended from the hip at an angle and to serve as a resting place for a powdered wrist and a drooping kerchief. A Louis XIV cane is of malacca, silver mounted, scrolled. In this era sticks had round ivory tops, carved with cherubim and sentimental hearts. Porcelain was also used. Natural malacca wood served the First Empire, agate-topped, with gold or silver inlay work.

In his curious group of varying staves one sees the play spirit manifest, art above utility, and sighs that on the Avenue de l'Opéra swords are now sheathed in canes and that on Broadway many a presentable malacca houses a utilitarian umbrella.

It's significant. For the day of the truly distinctive cane that was a simple work of art is gone. Every one, says M. Tessier, packs a cane nowadays in Paris, on the Continent and in England. But what canes! Made by machines, he says, and no joy to a connoisseur.

The attempt to make exceptional canes now, he says, ends in merely putting jewels in them. "Russian refugees have come to me," he said, "with canes of royalty. They do not interest me. They are not exceptional. They have plenty of jewels but no personality. Their canes belong in a bijouterie."

But not all canes end in a professional collection. Some hardy Americans take them home. Still others, remembering their native town, steal softly out in the dark night and drop over the side of the swift ship the symbol of their temporary expansiveness, and so return to repressions and inhibitions and support of the Volstead act.

NEW STRONG MAN IN CHINA

We may not need to fight much; we will organize. Perhaps within a year we shall start our Northern expedition, for the Kuomintang is strong on the Yangtze River and we have many calls for help."

It seemed an impossibly rosy picture then, but Chiang has already accomplished more than he predicted.

"Yes," I said, "but what then?"

"We will cancel the unequal treaties and set China free."

I raised my eyebrows.

"It will not be difficult," he went on. "In one, two, at most three, years it will be done." And, to be sure, Canton has already begun to revise her customs duties without consulting foreign powers.

"What do you mean by the 'unequal treaties'?" I persisted. "Do you expect to recover rule of Shanghai and get Hongkong back from Great Britain?"

He waved me aside. "Those are political questions; they will settle themselves when China is unified. Unity is our first job. Extraterritoriality and customs control will, of course, go before we recover Hongkong."

And then he began to catechize me keenly about America's attitude toward China and Japan. "Your statesmen talk in a more friendly way," he said, "but in the end they sign the same treaties as the British and the Japanese, and we like an attitude of straightforward opposition better."

There was no questioning the sincerity and intensity of the man as a Chinese patriot. But can he work with other men? Is he really a party man, a cooperator, or just another personal dictator? Strong men have risen and fallen interminably in China since the revolution. Will Chiang go the way of the rest, or is he a strong man come to stay—a man who understands how to work with a national party and move from military dictatorship toward a measure of democracy? I do not know; but his prophecies of military successes, which seemed so swollen last Winter, have proved uncannily accurate.

CLAY'S OLD HOME PROPOSED FOR MUSEUM

Ashland, the Estate of the "Great Commoner," Is Associated With the Early History of the United States

By LORINE L. BUTLER

ASHLAND, the historic home of Henry Clay at Lexington—an ivy-covered mansion closely associated with the formative years of the United States—will be converted into a museum, its spacious grounds forming a memorial park, if the plans of a group of loyal Kentuckians materialize.

Since the death of Henry Clay, the estate has changed ownership several times. While in possession of his oldest son, James B. Clay, the original house, which had been pronounced unsafe—even Henry Clay is reported to have said that it would not last much longer than himself—was torn down. But it was rebuilt out of much of its own materials and upon the same foundation, and practically after the old plan. With the exception of many of the ash trees that gave the place its name, the grounds are almost as the "Great Commoner" left them. Particularly, this is true of "Henry Clay's Walk," a semi-circular path beneath the trees, where the statesman used to pace when pondering his weighty problems.

It was from the "Ashland District"—so called from his estate—that Henry Clay was sent to Congress in 1811. He was just thirty-four years of age when he went to Washington as a member of the House of Representatives. Immediately, he was elected Speaker of the "war party." While eminently pacific by nature and principle, Clay believed in fighting for the right, and it was his eloquence, combined with his prestige as Speaker, that determined the hesitating House and reassured President Madison when his decision wavered. Historians agree that the War of 1812 was owing more to Henry Clay than to any other individual.

From that time until the day of his death, he was a national figure. During the sixty years preceding the Civil War, Henry Clay was one of the most influential men in shaping the destiny of the new nation. And he was a leader in the advocacy of those principles of right for which he steadfastly stood. He was the author of the famous saying: "I would rather be right than President."

The history of Henry Clay's thwarted aspiration to the White House is little more than the history of a personal feud. The antagonism that existed between General Jackson and Clay was a controlling factor in the political situation in the first half of the nineteenth century; the ascendency of one meant the decline of the other. The influence exerted by Jackson and directed against Clay was immediately responsible for his defeat when success seemed most assured in the presidential campaign of 1832.

It was as an orator—in the days when oratory held sway over the minds of men—that Clay rose to preeminence. His winning personality, his magnetic voice and captivating courtesy easily placed him foremost among the public speakers of his time. Limited as had been his early opportunities for advancement, it was by the exercise of his natural gifts that he won his position of commanding power.

Clay's Supreme Effort

The supreme effort of Clay's congressional life was in connection with the Missouri Compromise of 1821. In those early days slavery occupied a similar position in politics to that of prohibition today; and the question divided Congress into set opponents defined as the wets and drys of our own time.

With all the force of his personality and eloquence, Henry Clay labored unceasingly to effect a compromise—and through his tact and perseverance the plan prevailed. It was his triumph in this crisis that won him the title of "Pacificator."

Sadly enough, it was for the compromise when it was again a question for debate in 1849, that Clay made his last great speech—putting forth such supreme effort, and so far beyond his feeble strength, that it was said to have been the immediate cause of his death.

Henry Clay's democracy and humanity might be said to be the chief reasons for his popularity. Chivalrous to a degree, he gave his services to the poor and oppressed without compensation. And in his early career he spent his eloquence in the defense of free negroes and slaves, when such procedure was contrary to public sentiment. Equally courageous was he in prosecuting the rich and influential when other attorneys feared to appear against them.

It was this same spirit of chivalry that brought about his first "affair of honor" on the dueling field. Colonel Joseph Hamilton Daviess, District Attorney of the Federal Court of Kentucky, had assaulted a man named Bush, a tavern keeper of Frankfort. As the aggressor was a person of such prominence, no lawyer would take the case of the lowly Bush. Henry Clay assumed his cause, and in his conduct of the affair so offended the important Colonel Daviess that he demanded "satisfaction." The affair was arranged, but the seconds "secured an accommodation."

While Henry Clay realized the fallacy of the dueling system—and declaimed against it—he was involved in two other encounters. His next meeting on the field of honor, in 1808, was brought about by a controversy in the Kentucky Legislature with Humphrey Marshall, a distinguished Federalist, over the protection policy of home industries. Clay had introduced a measure recommending the members to wear homespun only, in furtherance of the Jeffersonian cause. For this he was denounced by Marshall as a demagogue, and the wordy engagement that followed ended in arrangements for a duel. In this affair each received a slight flesh wound and satisfaction was declared all around. Clay's third engagement was called the last "hightoned" duel of the time, his opponent being John Randolph of Roanoke.

As an ardent exponent of the "American system of Protection," Clay's earliest efforts in Congress were directed toward a policy of protection which would secure an Eastern market for hemp, the staple product of Kentucky. Otherwise the wide distance from the leading markets made it impossible for the Kentucky farmers to compete with the foreign import. Protection for all home industries, improvement of conditions pertaining to the welfare of the people, and the application of national aid to internal development, were parts of his "American system."

The tariff law of 1816—the result of Henry Clay's efforts—was the first attempt to effect an economic standard whereby the rate of protection was proportioned as nearly as possible to the difference between the cost of the imported and the home product.

Henry Clay likewise labored for the spirit of union among the States. During those troubious days preceding the Civil War, he even threatened to go against his beloved Kentucky if at any time she attempted secession.

While it is as a statesman that Henry Clay is generally known, he was equally eminent as a farmer and breeder of live stock. And Ashland was the pride and delight of his life. Here he enjoyed not only the pleasures of home and family but rest and recreation from his arduous duties at Washington. It was from Ashland that he dated his private correspondence—not Lexington or Kentucky—intense Kentuckian though he was. But after the fashion of the country gentlemen of the day, he was known as Henry Clay of Ashland. It was in this manner that his last will, dated July 10, 1851, begins—"I, Henry Clay, of Ashland."

Many of these letters from Ashland reveal his love for the beautiful bluegrass acres, and his interest in improving farm products of all kinds. He imported asses from Spain, [illegible] from Portugal, Merino and Saxon sheep, English cattle and horses. The Kentucky Agricultural Association, established in 1814, awarded him a silver cup for the "best Saxon ram." And the racing horses of Ashland were far famed. Many of the most noted turf champions of the day were raised at Ashland.

Upon the death of Henry Clay his son, John, succeeded to his thoroughbred interests and that part of Ashland "lying on the Tates Creek road." John Clay became one of the foremost breeders of his time. A race track, one of the first private tracks in Kentucky, was established at Ashland, and the races held here were important events in sporting circles. Among the famous horses that carried the Ashland colors of buff and blue to victory were Day Star and Riley, winners of the Kentucky Derby, and Maggie B. B., dam of Iroquois, the only American bred horse that ever won an English Derby.

A Woman in Charge

In that delicate era when ladies were only supposed to "sit on a cushion and sew a fine seam," Mrs. John M. Clay inherited from her husband his farm and twelve brood mares. And to the surprise of a wondering world, she continued her husband's business and became one of the first woman breeders in the United States. Remarkable success attended her professional pioneering, and through her efforts the tradition of Ashland was continued.

During the time of Henry Clay many famous men entered the broad portals of the delightful mansion. Committees gathered to discuss the affairs of the nation. Foreign diplomats, Presidents, Governors and men of all professions enjoyed the hospitality of Ashland. As one walks through the stately garden, one may imagine the "Commoner" strolling here with the Marquis de Lafayette, or perhaps showing the forest trees and rolling bluegrass pastures to President Monroe or Daniel Webster.

And today the visitor views the dining room furniture and the family silver that graced the table around which the distinguished guests once gathered. Here is the wine glass that

"A View of the Attack Against Fort Washington and Rebel Redoubts Near New York on the 16th of November, 1776, by the British and Hessian Brigades."

Drawn on the Spot by Theo. Davies, Captain of British Artillery. Illustrations on This Page by Courtesy of Kennedy & Co.

TRAITOR CAUSED THE LOSS OF NEW YORK

Capture of Fort Washington Followed the Desertion of William Demont, Who Took Its Plans to the British

One of the dark days of the American Revolution was Nov. 16, 1776, when the British took Fort Washington and caused the evacuation of Manhattan Island. That battle and its effect on the morale of the American troops are described in the accompanying article, one of a series dealing with important events of the Revolution.

By R. L. DUFFUS

THE Americans had built Fort Lee and Fort Washington to keep the British fleet from ascending the Hudson River. Between them they had stretched, or tried to stretch, a "sunken chevaux-de-frise," consisting of hulks fastened to a big chain in such a way as to float just below the surface of the water. General Greene, who had charge of these arrrangements, thought them admirable. General Washington was not so optimistic—he never was optimistic.

On Oct. 6, a few days before Howe started on the campaign in Westchester County which ended with the battle of White Plains, three British men-of-war—the Phoenix, Roebuck and Tartar—sailed placidly up between the forts and over the chevaux-de-frise. The American gunners on both banks opened on them furiously, but did little damage. The ships came to anchor in Haverstraw Bay. A few days later several other British ships came up opposite Fort Lee and blazed away merrily for an hour or so. One of them had to be towed off and the Americans thought it badly damaged. But Washington knew what these incidents meant. The forts might annoy the British, but they could not prevent them passing up and down the river. He immediately proposed that Fort Washington be abandoned.

Congress Intervenes

Had he insisted upon this point a disaster to the American arms might have been avoided. But he felt himself the obedient servant of Congress, and Congress, for political reasons, was determined that its armies should keep some hold upon Manhattan Island. "I am inclined to think," he wrote to Greene, who was in command at the fort, "that it will not be prudent to hazard the men and stores at Fort Washington; but as you are on the spot, I leave it to you to give such orders as to evacuating Mount Washington as you may judge best."

Greene interpreted this letter to mean that he was to hold on as long as he liked or was able—and for him this meant all Winter. Instead of abandoning his lines and joining Washington at White Plains he reinforced them.

After standing off General Howe at the White Plains fight and seeing him march away toward Dobbs Ferry, Washington went north with 5,000 troops, crossed the Hudson near Stony Point, out of range of the guns of the Phoenix, Roebuck and Tartar, and established headquarters at Hackensack. Late on the night of Nov. 15 he went to Fort Lee and started out in a small rowboat to inspect Fort Washington.

"I had partly crossed the North River," he wrote, "when I met General Putnam and General Greene, who were just returning from thence, and they informed me that the troops were in high spirits and would make a good defense, and it being late at night I returned." According to Greene, Washington on this occasion was in one of his rare states of high excitement. He might well have been. Had he rowed across to the Manhattan shore twenty-four hours earlier he would have come upon thirty flat-boats, crowded with British soldiers, who were being taken to Spuyten Duyvil Creek in preparation for the attack Howe planned for the 16th. The boats passed the American sentries unseen and unheard.

Howe had made his arrangements, thanks to William Demont, with full knowledge of the situation within Fort Washington. Demont was adjutant to Colonel Magaw, commander of the garrison. It occurred to him that the British might win the war and that it would be ever so convenient to be on the victorious side. He gathered all the information he could and went with it to Lord Percy. So unobtrusively did he work that his treason never received the attention it deserved. Indeed, the details were not generally known until the publication, two generations after the war, of a letter in which he boasted of it. This was written in 1792, probably in the hope of a British pension.

"On the 2d of November, 1776," it said, "I sacrificed all I was worth in the world to the service of my King and country and joined the then Lord Percy; brought in with me the plans of Fort Washington, by which plans that fortress was taken by His Majesty's troops the 16th inst., together with 2,700 prisoners and stores and ammunition to the amount of £8,000. At the same time I might with justice affirm, from my knowledge of the works, I saved the lives of many of His Majesty's subjects. These are facts well known to every general officer which was there." But by a trick of fate Demont, whose treason was successful, escaped the execration heaped upon the unhappy Arnold, whose treason failed.

Howe's Plan of Attack

The system of defenses known as Fort Washington included not only the fort itself but several smaller fortified points covering the Harlem and North Rivers, and a triple line along Harlem Heights. Howe's plans to get possession were as elaborate as if he had Washington's whole army in his grasp, instead of about 3,000 men. The main body of Germans, under Knyphausen and Rahl, were to come down the King's Bridge and attack on the north. Detachments of British grenadiers and Scotch highlanders were to land on the banks of the Harlem River, near Fort George, or Laurel Hill. Lord Percy, with a force of British and Hessians, was to move in from Harlem Plains. The man-of-war Pearl was brought up to make matters as unpleasant as possible for any members of the garrison who should try to escape to the Jersey shore.

Thus the trap was set. But before springing it Howe sent word to Colonel Magaw as to the fate the American mouse might expect if the British lion lost its temper. Would it not be better to surrender, he asked, and save many valuable lives? If the fort resisted he was not certain that he could answer for his men. Magaw took this as a threat of no quarter, and answered proudly, though perhaps not wisely, that he was "determined to defend the post to the very last extremity."

The British staff work was good. The attacks began promptly on the

STRANGE TOMB AWES ARABS

Mystery and Legend Have Grown Up Around "Tombeau de la Chretienne," Near Algiers

A MYSTERIOUS tomb, regarded with awe by the lowly Arabs of the region, stands on the crest of a lofty hill, about fifty miles from Algiers. It is known as Le Tombeau de la Chrétienne—the tomb of the Christian Woman—although French scholars regard it, without proof, as a Punic remain antedating the Christian era by at least two centuries.

So little is actually known of this mausoleum that small wonder is occaseloned by the fantastic legend handed down about it in truly Oriental style throughout the countryside. The Arabs themselves call it Khour Er-Roumia, which means European or Christian Tombs, the use of the plural suggesting that they regarded it as a multiple tomb. Even their legend throws little light on the origin of the strange edifice.

The mystery that hangs about it is deepened by current Arab legends, which imply the fixed belief that much undiscovered treasure lies buried inside.

At the top of the hill, which rises a thousand feet above the Mediterranean, this extraordinary relic of antiquity rears itself an additional hundred feet. The structure is a circular mass of dressed stone, at least 200 feet in diameter.

Sixty engaged columns, sculptured in relief and resembling the Ionic in style, decorate the lower circumference of the tambour—a drum-shaped edifice, originally surmounted by a lofty cone of rock. At the four cardinal points of the compass huge false portals are sculptured. A design on each of them, resembling a great cross, is responsible for the present French name of the ruin.

A Curb on the Vandals

In an effort to discover the treasure two small tunnels were long ago broken through the centre. On one side near the summit is a considerable depression made by Baba Mohammed Ben Othman, Pasha of Algeria, in 1776, when he used cannon to demolish the tomb. The French Government has now put a stop to the work of treasure hunters and other vandals, and some years ago restored one of the principal facades.

Entrance is possible through a low and very narrow passage which earlier excavations revealed in the substructure beneath one of the false portals—that facing the east. This entrance leads to a fairly spacious vaulted chamber whose solid stone masoned walls had apparently never borne decorations. But the right-hand wall has small relief sculptures of a lion and lioness.

Directly underneath these bas-reliefs another short, constricted passage, which has to be traversed on hands and knees, leads to seven ascending steps and then into a spacious and beautifully vaulted gallery built of large blocks of neatly dressed stone. This gallery, spiral in form, is more than 400 feet long. At the end a third passage leads first into a small chamber and then into a larger one. This was supposed, until recently, to be the exact centre of the monument, but it is now known that it is somewhat off centre, whether through accident or design is not determined.

The purpose of the chambers is also in doubt. Nothing has been found in them or in the spiral gallery. It may be supposed that the first was a vestibule to the second, in which three niches are sunk in the bare walls. It is a further guess that the niches were intended to hold cinerary urns. It is possible that these supposed mortuary chambers are blinds, like the four portals, and that the real vaults are deep in the foundations, approached by vertical shafts with horizontal passages at the bottom.

This manner of entombing the dead—filling up and disguising the shafts after each interment—corresponds with the Phoenician and Punic practices of antiquity. If this supposition be true, the tomb still guards its secret, and the local Arabic tradition of the multiple tomb is not without meaning.

The builder, whoever he may have been, chose well the site of his last resting place. To the north, a thousand feet below, stretches the waters of the Mediterranean; to the south, long green slopes reach into the fruitful Valley of the Mitidja. Along the southern horizon the cedar-bearing Atlas Mountains rear their purple wall, from which clear streams descend to make the valley prosperous.

Tales for Children

Small wonder, then, that the Arabs, when a magic moon suffuses the night and lights the ruin above them, tell their children the fantastic tale of the legendary Ben Kassem who was captured by Christians and carried off to Spain, the servant of an aged savant.

Weeping over his captivity, Ben Kassem was observed by his master, who one day said to him:

"I will restore you to your country and family if you swear to do all I ask of you."

Ben Kassem swore to obey.

"When you have tarried there three days with your family," the master commanded, "repair to the Tomb of the Christian Woman and there, facing east, burn this paper in the fire of a brazier. Do not be surprised at anything that may happen, and return quietly to your home. That is all I ask of you; and in return for your faithful performance of this mission you shall have your freedom."

Ben Kassem obeyed his instructions implicitly, and a wonderful thing happened. Scarcely had the paper been consumed on the brazier when the tomb opened and there issued a stream of gold and silver pieces that mounted skyward and flew in a slender line along the seashore toward the lands of the Christians.

Ben Kassem, petrified at first by the sight of so much treasure, recovered himself in time to catch some of the coins in his turban. The tomb then closed again of its own accord. For a long time he kept his secret but at length was moved to relate the marvelous experience.

The tale came to the ears of Pasha Salah Rais, who ruled about 1550. He promptly sent a great number of workmenn to the tomb with orders to demolish it and recover the treasure. But scarcely had the work begun when a woman appeared suddenly on the summit of the monument. Extending her arms toward the lake at the base of the mountain, she cried:

"Hallula! Hallula! Come to my aid!"

Immediately a cloud of enormous mosquitos dispersed the laborers, and none of them could be induced to return to the task.

This story, told throughout the Mitidja, suggests something of the glamour that surrounds the tomb in the minds of the Algerian population.

Whatever its explanation, the tomb towers there on the hill, mute symbol of the civilization that reached such high levels along the Mediterranean two millennlums ago and then was overwhelmed by an oblivion so profound that even the name and secret purpose of this relic of its greatness has not yet been lifted from the depths.

PUCCINI'S 'TURANDOT' HAS ROMANTIC PAST

Posthumous Opera, to Be Sung This Week, Is Based on Gozzi's Famous Play

By H. I. BROOK

ONE of the oldest of the world's love legends—the legend of the Princess who was only to be won by the answering of deadly riddles—is the subject of the last opera by Giacomo Puccini, the opera he had not quite completed when he died. It is billed for its first New York performance this week at the Metropolitan. "Turandot" is this legend in a Chinese setting. But Puccini owes everything except the music—and a few names which have been Gilbert-and-Sullivanized—to a lively Venetian gentleman who, besides ten pieces for the theatre, wrote what he called his "Useless Memoirs."

These memoirs have been favorably compared with those left to posterity by their author's much more celebrated fellow-citizen and contemporary, Casanova. Yet they have been regrettably neglected. The fact is that Count Carlo Gozzi confined all his adventures, even his amours, to Venice, whereas the other cannily dispersed his indiscretions over the Continent of Europe. And he wrote in the language of Paris.

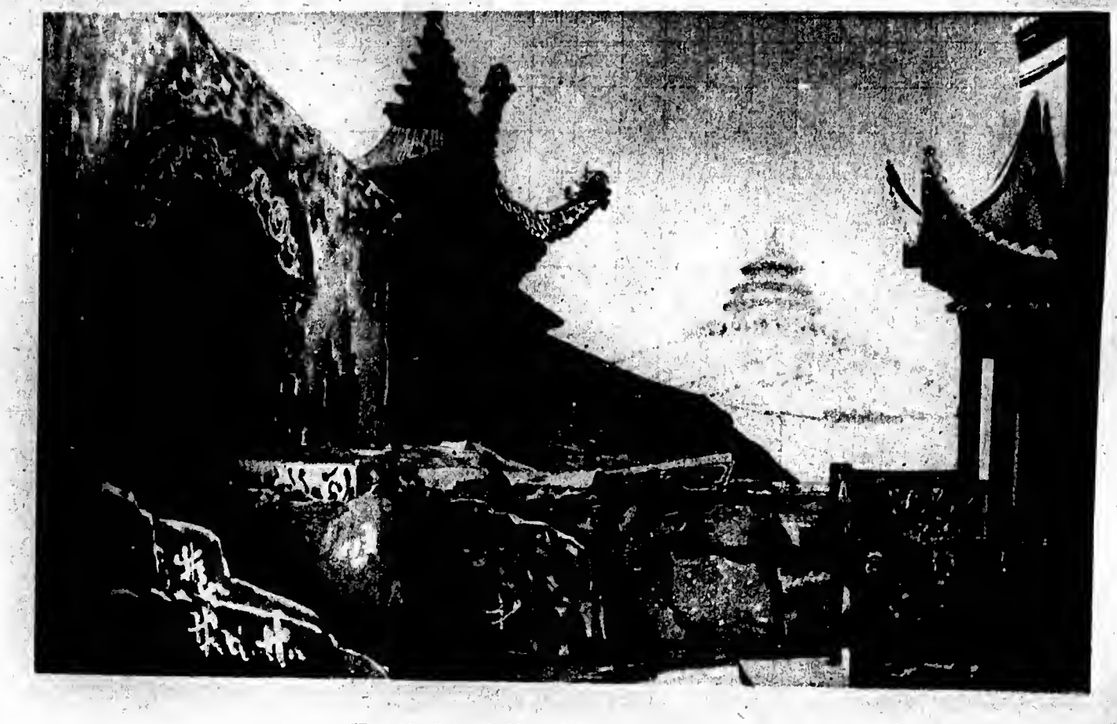
Gozzi and Goldoni

About the time that our Colonel Washington was saving the remnant of General Braddock's redcoats from the Indian allies of the French in the wilderness around Fort Duquesne (now immortalized as Pittsburgh), this Count Gozzi, whose title, it seems, was not quite of the first water, was reaching the triumphant end of a literary duel with Goldoni—another Carlo and another writer of memoirs as well as of stage pieces. The matter in dispute was Goldoni's lapse from patriotism in going after French models, like Molière, for his comedies, instead of patterning his work on that of his Italian predecessors. Goldoni did eventually get clean away to Paris and was set up by Louis XVI in an apartment in Versailles. It was in these regal surroundings that he wrote his own memoirs.

The meat in the cocoanut at this point, however, is that out of the encounter between the renegade and Gozzi were born the latter's ten stage pieces. The first of the ten was "The Love of the Three Oranges," which has already been seen here as an opera—not by Puccini and not at the Metropolitan. Prokofieff furnished the score and the Chicago people the production. Another of the ten was "Turandot."

Thus the Italian original of Mr. Gatti-Casazza's outstanding European novelty of the season just begun is a little older than the Revolutionary War which gave us name as a nation; and though Puccini has been less than two years in his grave, the virtual librettist of his piece belonged to the generation of Dr. Johnson and Sir Joshua Reynolds.

Studenia of the comparative anatomy of scandal point out also that Gozzi's affair with a certain Teodora Ricci, an actress of Venice, is allied by quaint analogies with the English case of Congreve and Mrs. Bracegirdle—she who lies beneath the flagstones under the arches of one of the cloisters of Westminster, a cloister where faithful servants are buried and where rests a person who was a prizefighter. The rôle of protector may or may not cover the sin in such affairs; but both dramatists were "protectors."



"Turandot," Act I, Metropolitan Opera Production.

The New Opera's Past

What counts in that the Metropolitan's new opera has a past that goes further back than the first European performance, at the Scala in Milan last April, and does not merely include the record of the subsequent performances in Dresden (in June) and in Vienna and Buenos Aires still more recently. It has a past that goes back even of Puccini's getting to work on the score (at least as long ago as 1923), in the house at Viareggio which he called his "California bungalow."

According to first-hand descriptions, that hungalow really borrowed as many suggestions from "Madame Butterfly" as it did from "The Girl of the Golden West." But there is no doubt that it housed the piano upon which was composed the music that was to transform Gozzi's "chinoiserie" into grand opera and, in due time, to let the rise of a yellow brocade curtain on the sunset side of Broadway reveal it done up in Joseph Urban scenery to the most expensive collection of music lovers in the world.

This is no place to deal with Puccini's music, which the European critics have already appraised according to their lights and which the American critics will presently judge according to theirs. The merit of Mr. Urban's setting as compared with that of the Milan and Dresden and Vienna productions is another concern of connoisseurs—those of art, perhaps. But old Gozzi's play has a history reaching back to its first performance in Venice in the last days of the glory of Venice—just before, as John Addington Symonds says, "the old Republic of St. Mark fell in the crash of the French Revolution." Schiller made a translation of the piece into German in 1802, which was the year after he translated Shakespeare's "Macbeth"; and though there have been long years of eclipse and neglect, it did not need Puccini's music to bring it to life again.

The last decade has seen it reappear in Europe in repeated spectacular revivals. Only a few years ago the Moscow Art Theatre did "Turandot," to the admiration of all who make pilgrimages to their shrine. Still more recently Reinhardt did it at Salzburg in a version by Karl Vollmoeller. This very season we are having it done ourselves by the Provincetown group of actors in an English adaptation of the Russian version of Vakhtangov.

The Same Turandot

In the European performances of the pre-operatic etage liberties were freely enough taken with old Gozzi's play. But in these performances were no Pang, Ping and Pong, as Lord High Flunkies of the Imperial Court of Peking. This is pure operatic licenee. The Oriental magnates bear in Gozzi's text titles of a more Italian than Celestial ring. But the Princess who keeps matrimony at bay with riddles and sees without a quaim one after another depart from the test the sultors who will "straightway be beheaded" is the same Turandot. Her imperial father, outraged by her contumacy, is the same, or much the same. And the suitor who eventually does not get beheaded is the same Kalaf, Prince of Tartary, son of Timur, who for the moment is a King without a kingdom.

It may be observed that though Count Gozzi had an aristocratic leaning toward satire and indulged that veln to considerable extent in the pieces that were the ammunition of his campaign before the people against Goldoni, the Germans very soon discovered in him the soul of the romanticist. "Turandot," for all the grimness that the Eastern setting allows, is a romantical tale—in the end. It is therefore very proper material for an opera by the author of "Madame Butterfly"; very proper material for an art that undertakes to appeal to the emotions through the eye and the ear with such assistance from the spoken word as

SAINTHOOD ASKED FOR STEVENSON'S HERO

Father Damien, Who Nursed the Lepers of Molokai, "Shut With His Own Hand the Door of His Own Sepulchre"

By DIANE O'CONNELL

CANONIZATION of Father Damien having been proposed and the process of beatification begun in Rome, the world has renewed its interest in the career and martyrdom of the priest of the lepers on Hawaii. Father Damien's heroic work among the exiled lepers became widely known through the attacks of the Rev. C. M. Hyde of Honolulu and the defense of his character by Robert Louis Stevenson, who wrote of him: "He shut to with his own hand the door of his own sepulchre."

The last letter of the priest, dated Feb. 4, 1889, written shortly before his death and addressed to Sister Ignatius in a Belgian convent, told of his contracting the dreadful disease. This letter has just been brought to this country. Letters from the priest of the lepers are extremely rare, and this one is especially interesting, having been written on the third page of a letter from another hero of the leper colony, Brother Joseph Dutton. Brother Joseph labored on the Island of Molokai with Father Damien for three years before the latter's death, and for forty years has never left the settlement. Though now 85 years of age, Brother Joseph is still carrying on Father Damien's work on Molokai.

Two thousand miles from the mainland, far out in the vast reaches of the Pacific Ocean, the Hawaiian Islands today form the crossroads of the Pacific. Far otherwise was it in Father Damien's time. The Sandwich Islands—as Hawaii was then called—had not yet been annexed by the United States. The Kanakas were living in a primitive state under their rulers, and the only civilization was that brought by missionaries and traders, after long voyages in sailing vessels.

Black and Bleak Molokai

Each of the islands has its distinct and different character. Hawaii has its strange black sands and white surf, its volcanoes and vast forests. Oahu is sheltered by its great coral reef, with foaming surf breaking against the palm-fringed shore; its forest-clad hills cleft by narrow valleys, where waterfalls tumble down the steep cliffs like ribbons of silver. Maui is an island of green hills and wide grassy plateaus, while Kauai, with its wonderful canyon, is known as the Garden Island. Molokai, lying between Oahu and Maui, is black and bleak. Its steep cliffs rise abruptly from the restless ocean, where treacherous rocks and shifting currents make landings hazardous. Frowning and inhospitable shores seem to say "Kapu"—it is forbidden—to the stranger who seeks to visit the place.

At the foot of a steep "pali," 2,200 feet high, on the windward side of the island, where a narrow peninsula juts out into the sea, remote and difficult to reach by land and dangerous by sea, the leper colony of Kalawao lives its life-in-death isolated from the world. On the other side of the peninsula is the Bishop Home for leper women and girls at Kalaupapa.

Lepers were partly isolated in 1863, but it was not until the Hawaiian Legislature passed a law in 1865 that segregation was strictly enforced. In that remote spot, away from their relatives and friends, forgotten often by those charged with their care, they had little medical attention, nursing or even ordinary necessities of life. They were left to live or die, as the case might be, the outcasts of the islands, in poverty and misery, till Father Damien took pity on their plight. Moved by their distress, he went to live among them, work among them. By his energy and sacrifice he brought about reforms and bettered their mode of living. Briefly, he devoted his life to their service.

No greater contrast could be imagined than these, Dr. Hyde and Father Damien, both ministers of the gospel and both stationed on a far-away bit of earth among the primitive peoples of the Pacific. Although both were Christians, the two men were of different sects, different nationalities, different social classes, different educations and, above all, of totally different characters.

Dr. Hyde was of rigid New England stock. He was narrow, hard and bigoted, and as such entirely out of sympathy with the gentle, indolent, laughter-loving Hawaiians, who only asked to be left alone to be happy with their own gods and with their music and hulas. While Dr. Hyde brought to the carefree, affectionate Hawaiians a God of fear and punishment, Father Damien told them of a God of mercy and pity.

Father Damien.

Joseph Damien de Veuster was of peasant origin and was born Jan. 3, 1840, in the Village of Tremeloo, near Louvain, in Belgium. That his family was pious may be gathered from the fact that he had a sister who entered a convent and a brother who became a priest. After Joseph felt the call to a religious life he first thought of joining the Trappist monks, but instead he became a member of the Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary, an order familiarly known as the Picpus Fathers.

On the eve of sailing for the Sandwich Islands as a missionary, the brother of Joseph was taken seriously ill and could not go. Father Damien, although not yet in holy orders, elected to take the place of his brother. He arrived in Honolulu on March 19, 1864, and soon afterwards he was ordained.

Until 1873, he lived the ordinary life of a missionary priest, but in that year he happened to be one of a party of clerics taken by the Bishop of Hawaii to the neighboring island of Maui, where a chapel was to be dedicated. While on this trip, Father Damien heard of the pitable condition of the lepers on Molokai, and volunteered his services to the hopelessly afflicted. His offer was accepted, and he was sent out to the leper colony almost at once.

Father Damien made several visits to Honolulu in the early years of his life on Molokai, but after 1880 he never left the settlement, as he had by that time contracted the disease.

Meanwhile, his critic, Dr. Hyde, was living at Kalaupapa. Four months after the death of Father Damien, on Aug. 2, 1889, Mr. Hyde wrote a letter to the Rev. H. B. Gage of Riverside, Cal., bitterly attacking the character of the dead priest.

This letter, together with an article, was published in The Occident of San Francisco. It was read by Robert Louis Stevenson, then in Sydney, Australia. Stirred by what he considered cruel injustice, the novelist wrote a defense of Father Damien, both as man and priest, which he had privately printed at his own expense.

The author of "Treasure Island" knew whereof he was writing, for he had spent a fortnight on Molokai and had frequently visited the leper settlement only a short time after Father Damien's death. Stevenson knew at first hand of the heroic selflessness shown by the Belgian priest.

Little did Dr. Hyde dream when he launched his bitter attack upon the morals of the dead Father Damien that the gifted writer of romance would accept the challenge of battle and direct the attention of the world to the man who gave his life for the Molokai lepers.

In his letter to Dr. Gage the Honolulu missionary had said about Father Damien that, "The simple truth is that he was a coarse, dirty man, headstrong and bigoted. He was not sent to Molokai, but went there without orders; did not stay at the leper settlement (before he became one himself). He had no hand in the reforms and improvements, which were the work of our Board of Health. He was not a pure man in his relations with women, and the leprosy of which he died should be attributed to his vices and carelessness."

In his open letter to Dr. Hyde, Stevenson described his impressions of Molokai: "Molokai—Molokai Ahina, the gray, lofty and most desolate island—along all its northern side plunges a front of precipice into a sea of unusual profundity. This range of cliff is from east to west, the true end and frontier of the island. Only in one spot there projects into the ocean a certain triangular and rugged down, grassy, stony, windy and rising in the midst into a hill with a dead crater; the whole bearing to the cliff that overlaps it somewhat the same relation as a bracket to a wall. With this hint, you will now be able to pick out the leper station on a map."

Of his arrival at the leper colony Stevenson says: "When I was pulled ashore there early one morning, there sat with me in the boat two sisters, bidding farewell (in humble imitation of Damien) to the lights and joys of human life. One of these wept silently; I could not withhold myself from joining her. And as the boat drew but a little nearer, and you beheld the stairs crowded with abominable deformations of our common manhood, and saw yourself landing in the midst of such a population as only now and then surrounds us in the horrors of a nightmare—what a haggard eye you would have rolled over your reluctant shoulder toward the house on Beretania Street! [Dr. Hyde's house in Honolulu.]

Life in the Lazaretto

"Had you gone on; had you found every fourth face a blot upon the landscape; had you visited the hospital and seen the butt-ends of human beings lying there, almost unrecognizable, but still breathing, still thinking, still remembering, you would have understood that life in the lazaretto is an ordeal from which the nerves of a man's spirit shrink, even as his eye quails under the brightness of the sun; you would have felt it was (even today) a pitiful place to visit and a hell to dwell in. It is not the fear of a possible infection. That seems a little thing when compared with the pain, the pity and the disgust of the visitor's surroundings and the atmosphere of affliction, disease and physical disgrace in which he breathes.

"* * * That which I saw and suffered from was a settlement purged, bettered, beautified; the new village built, the new hospital and the Bishop Home excellently arranged; the Sisters, the doctors, the missionaries, all indefatigable in their noble tasks. It was a different place when Damien came there and made his great renunciation and slept that first night under a tree amidst his rotting brethren, alone with pestilence and looking forward (with what courage, with what pitiful sinkings of dread, God only knows) to a lifetime of dressing sores and stumps. * * *

"Father Damien might have been uncouth, domineering, hot-tempered, careless in dress and language—the counts which have been brought against him by his critics—but he was intensely human and sympathetic, alive with rugged vitality and noble generosity. He was one of the world's least spectacular heroes and went into a living grave to be of service to suffering humanity. For fifteen years he ministered to the Molokai lepers and died in an advanced stage of the disease on April 15, 1889, his last agony being augmented by neglected pneumonia.

While he was alive, Father Damien was too poor and humble and unknown to be able to raise money for the care of his lepers on Kalawao; but now, years after his death, large sums are paid for his autograph letters.

This solitary priest, who during his lifetime was accused of being immoral, domineering, quarrelsome, ignorant and dirty, now, thirty-seven years after his death, is talked of as a candidate for canonization in his Church. As Sir Hugh Clifford, another defender of Father Damien, says: "Is it not well to see this solitary priest as he was—the single star of hope in a long night of human misery?"

Our booklets, "Fifty-three Years of Proven Safety" and "How to Build an Independent Income," answer all of these questions and many more. They are written in terms that are simple, practical, easily understood. They are valuable guides for men and women who lack investment experience as well as for experienced investors.

No Loss to Any Investor in 53 Years

"Fifty-three Years of Proven Safety" gives you the benefit of our 53 Years of continuous experience in the field of first mortgage investment. It explains, one by one, the safeguards that have resulted in our record of no loss to any investor in 53 years, and that now protect every investor in Smith Bonds.

It shows you how every Smith Bond is strongly secured by a first mortgage on a modern, income-producing city property, and how the margin of safety for investors is constantly increased by monthly sinking fund payments.

It tells you why confidence in Smith Bonds is world-wide, and why thousands of investors, living in 48 States and in 33 countries and territories abroad, have found it safe, convenient and profitable to buy Smith Bonds by mail.

Monthly Payments Earn Bond Interest

"How to Build an Independent Income" describes our Investment Savings Plan. It shows how you can buy Smith Bonds in any amount—$100, $200, $300, $400, $500, $1,000 or more—by monthly payments, and how regular monthly payments earn the full rate of bond interest.

It also cites a number of interesting examples of the purposes for which our investors are using this plan, tells you why America has become a nation of investors, and contains tables that show the splendid results you can accomplish by investing systematically at 6½%.

SPAIN TO SHOW HER FAMOUS TAPESTRIES

New Royal Museum Is To House Priceless Treasures Owned By Nation

The Story of Jason and Medea in Tapestry. Creusa Is Consumed by the Fire of the Fatal Robe Made for Her by Medea.

HISTORICAL tapestries, dazzling and gorgeous, are to be shown to an art-loving public in Spain when King Alfonso opens a wing of the great Royal Palace of Aranjuez on the banks of the Tagus as a tapestry museum. This collection alone contains more than 1,500 pieces, some of which are so rare and valuable that they have never been exhibited. The collection of tapestries belonging to the Spanish Crown is, it is claimed, unrivaled in quality, and so extensive that in arranging exhibits it had not been found necessary to rehang the same pieces when exhibiting examples of the finest work in the collection.

The Palace of Aranjuez, thirty miles south of Madrid, is not used as a residence by the royal family and its conversion into a centre of art is to be permanent.

This palace owes its existence to an idiosyncracy of Philip II. He erected the splendid building on the site where had been but a shooting villa, and for several months of the year Aranjuez became the seat of government. The various sovereigns who occupied the palace beautified it by erecting new structures and extending the gardens.

Known historically for the treaty of alliance concluded there between France and Spain in 1772, Aranjuez comes back into the active life of the nation as an art centre.

To the glory of the magnificent collection of arms and armor in the Prado Museum and the pictures in the Prado Gallery is now to be added this collection of tapestries.

The finest masterpieces of Renaissance art in armor, painting and tapestry were assiduously collected by the Spanish Kings of the House of Austria, who were patrons of the industrial arts of their time. These monarchs and their vice-gerents reigned as sovereigns in Brussels, the capital of the Low Countries, belonging to Spain, where the art of tapestry centred almost exclusively during the sixteenth century, when the Austrian House was at the height of its power.

In the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries Arras and Tournai were the seats of the industry; and later, from the seventeenth century, it centred in Paris even more than in Brussels. But in the splendid days of the Renaissance, tapestry was an art especially productive of remarkable achievements. The workshops of Brussels were unexcelled and their exquisite work was presided over by the representatives of Kings of Spain, to whom had been entrusted the government of the Low Countries.

The woven historical pictures were most appropriate for a nomad court without a capital, such as that maintained by the Kings of Castile and Aragon during the Middle Ages. By means of tapestries it was possible to improvise a royal abode in any city or village, in the country during a journey or in camp during war.

The royal collection has few Gothic tapestries, for most of those made during that period are preserved in the Spanish cathedrals. Those in the King's collection dating from the year 1500 are unique, rich in gold, splendid in coloring and exquisite in design.

Especially noteworthy is the story of the Virgin tapestries that formerly belonged to Philip the Handsome, father of the Emperor Charles V. (The four parts of "The Triumph of the Mother of God" are in themselves considered the peerless masterpieces of Gothic tapestry.)

Gold, silver, silk, wool are used in picturing gowns and robes. The treatment of flesh and hair is marvelous in texture and tone. The flesh tints represent highly elaborate intricacies of interweaving. The unknown artist, a great master, may be considered an immediate predecessor of Quintin Matsys. The other series, "Episodes in the Life of the Virgin," consisting of two pieces, has perhaps received even greater praise on account of its fuller movement and rich magnificence. But its author, of the school of Van Roem, lacks, it is said, the exquisite purity of artistic feeling displayed in "The Triumph of the Mother of God."

These two series, together with the tapestry of "The Mass of St. Gregory," stand at the head of Flemish art from the death of Memling to the rise of Matsys in about 1500.

After that date the supreme importance of the pictorial in tapestries over other aspects of Flemish art becomes emphasized and the cult of the beautiful supplants the cult of artistic truth.

The most typical characteristics of the Dutch Renaissance are displayed in "The Roads to Honor," "The Pentecost," the series of "The Deadly Sins" and several others. There is also the best preserved, if not the richest in gold thread, of the primitive Brussels series of "The Acts of the Apostles," by Raffaels, and an immense collection of Italianate tapestries, some copied from Italian artists, others from Flemish artists under the influence of Rome. They include the series of Scipio, St. Paul, Venus, the Spheres, Fables of Ovid, Abraham, and the Conquest of Tunis by Charles V, drawn by a painter who accompanied the expedition in order to take sketches of the campaign; and the admirable decorative series entitled, "The Monos (Apes) and Children at Play."

The Spanish King possesses a very full collection of Brussels tapestries belonging to the seventeenth century, the decadence of which is nowhere more evident than in the comparisons made possible by this collection.

Other Great Treasures

Copies of the most famous tapestries in the world, the "Acts of the Apostles" set at the Vatican, designed by Raphael for Pope Leo X to hang in the Sistine Chapel, are among the chief treasures of the royal Spanish collection. This set has full side and bottom borders of the compartment type, designed by Giulio Romano.

Of the eighteenth century, he has all the extant work of the Spanish looms of Santa Barbara, immortalized in the decadent art of the time by the fact that they wove so many tapestries after designs by Goya, the genius who is said to have created modern painting. But everything in the collection pales before the unrivaled beauty of the tapestries of Flemish Renaissance.

Hitherto there has been no means of exhibiting the royal collection. Some of the tapestries have been hung, twice each year, in the upper gallery of the palace on the occasion of the Candlemas procession (Feb. 2) and on the Sunday of Corpus Christi week in June. These brief showings have spread the fame of the collection about the world, and the few pieces taken to Paris in 1879 and to London in 1921 amazed those who saw them.

The creation of this new museum, it is held, is destined to enrich not Spain alone, but all of the world that appreciates art and loves the beautiful.

INDIAN PRINTS ADD COLOR TO DECORATIVE SCHEME

Oriental Textiles Serve Many Purposes in Present Vogue —Revival of Tole for Objects of Art Lends Quaint Note

By WALTER RENDELL STOREY

THE charge made at the recent conference on Oriental art that the American public is ignorant of the arts of the ear East apparently does not apply the arts further eastward; for the ndicraft of India is well repre- nted in the present vogue for India int hangings.

These hand block prints on cotton oth, in Indian and Persian designs, nge from small squares to hang- gs three yards long. They repeat tterns which have been character- tic of Indian textile art through ndreds of years. The designs of eds and blues and greens on white r tan backgrounds are the same as hose that so entranced the ladies of ngland and France in the eigh- enth century that they insisted on aving them in spite of drastic pro- ibitive duties inspired by the akers of domestic silk and wool abrics. Bootlegging in these beau- ful prints, which were used for ostume material as well as decora- ions, caused almost as much trouble s the authorities of the time as the affic in liquor today.

These rich-hued Eastern textiles re not only used for hangings in ntrance halls and living rooms but, ut in half or incorporated with ther fabrics, they work up into eautiful window draperies. Large ues are employed as bed covers or ortieres and their possibilities as ecorations for screens and lamp hades have already been widely ecognized by alert decorators.

Prints for Costumes

But the employment of these prints oday, as in the past, does not stop ith their decorative use. Madam so uses them in gay or exotic ostumes, no longer considered so nusual in view of the part odd de- gn and brilliant color play in wo- en's dress today.

The prints now imported are of ree chief types of patterns. The ost imposing style of design is the ree of Life, a motif running hrough all textile design of the ast. This flower-bedecked tree, in hose foliage birds of gay plumage ake their home and monkeys swing branches, is generally shown ising from a mound representing he earth. Graceful branches eander over the oblong panel in pparently aimless but artistic pat- rn. Often among the vegetation the foot of the tree may be dis- rned forms of cranes, giraffes, ater buffaloes. Sometimes the rders surrounding the central anel are made up of birds and illage, or of some of the many arieties of native flowers.

Another type of Indian print is less pictorial and suggests in its regular geometrical and floral patterns the more balanced designs of the Occident. The third style is obviously inspired by Persian art, reproducing the Persian prayer rug forms. This third type has the surface almost completely covered with a pattern of geometrical or conventionalized floral forms, as the devout Mohammedan who purchases the prints instead of the expensive woven wool rugs would not tolerate the representation of animal or human forms. The prayer rug type may nearly always be recognized by an arch incorporated into the design at one end.

Originally painted by hand the designs today are still printed by hand, wood blocks being employed. The teakwood blocks are but four or five inches square and, as one must be cut for each color, a great number are employed. The best dyes used are still the vegetable and animal dyes prepared by the natives. The beautiful reds come from an insect called kermes, found on a tropical tree; the yellows are derived from weld, a flower somewhat like the mignonette; and the blue is eastern indigo. These, with brown from walnut husks—a home-made dye in this country for many years—produce the characteristic bright color effects.

In India these prints have from the first served a great variety of purposes. They have been used as ceiling cloths for tents and rooms in houses; as curtains and wall hangings; for formal canopies indoors and for useful protection from the sun outside. Equally important has been their employment, in large sizes and elaborate designs, for decorations of temple cars in religious processions. Like the tapestry of Europe, the designs on the prints often commemorated historical events and personages.

Simply made, highly artistic in its effects, and adaptable to many uses, the Indian print seems destined to repeat today, in a foreign land, much of its original usefulness.

AS a decorative accessory, articles of tole—the painted tin and iron of other days—provide a quaint note for the modern interior. The present vogue is due not only to its comparative inexpensiveness but also to the many forms in which articles of this plastic metal may be obtained —trays, electrically equipped lamps, flower vases, tea kettles and samovars, with all that lies between, may be obtained in the traditional colors of scarlet, old blue, green, yellow and black or in other modern hues.

The French name of tole goes back to the days when the metal was a composition of iron with an alloy of lead, zinc or tin to prevent it from rusting too easily. Indeed, the word tole really means sheet iron. Today most tole is a high grade of tin, lighter and more malleable than the hammered iron used in the eighteenth and in the early nineteenth century.

There are collectors of old tole who seek out originals, and for these persons antique shops and auctions are preferred hunting grounds. To experts the older specimens have a softness of color which modern reproductions do not achieve. For connoisseurs a real "find" is a tea kettle or tray whose scarlet color and decoration in gold proclaim it a product of the East, brought, perhaps, to old Salem or New Bedford in the days when American ships were in the China trade; or a piece of old English or French ware. Tea caddies in Chinese tole were popular in those days, as well as Oriental-shaped covered dishes of gold and red, and boxes for milady's dressing table whose color and design suggested mysterious Cathay.

The French forms of tole of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, much reproduced today, include a great variety of utilitarian articles as well as those of pure decoration. Classic forms of vases and urns, bearing on their sides painted shepherdesses or garlanded flutes and horns and harps on backgrounds of old dull yellow or bronze, recall the time when objects of tole were found in every home of any pretension. In the Empire period wall sconces and lamps reflected the decorative motifs of that time. Pyramid forms and curved vases, supported on four lion's feet placed on a square of tole painted in semblance of black and white marble, are other characteristic designs.

English tole shows an even wider range of use than the French. Candlesticks and tea kettles, tea caddies, braziers and many trays are found in the old forms. The trays were often heavy things—one indication that they are of the old-time iron. English trays of the eighteenth century made at Ponypool and later at Birmingham—sometimes an old tray is stamped with one of these names —are now treasured even when the decorations have faded to a semblance of their former beauty.

Designs for Trays

These trays of tole, once found on every sideboard and today an aid to establishing old-time atmosphere in modern rooms, bear on their surfaces elaborate decorative designs of peacocks and pheasants; or, in the Chippendale manner, fantastic scrolls make up the border and trailing fountains drip lines of gold and color amid tea roses, begonias, morning glories and other old-fashioned flowers. Other designs in red or black and gold depict scenes of the Orient painted by English or American artists in that imaginative style of decoration more Oriental than the Orient itself.

All these styles of the past are now reproduced for the use of those who cannot get the rapidly disappearing originals. Old specimens of tole trays, even when the decoration has been partly obliterated by time, are taken in hand by craftsmen and the old design restored or a new pattern suggestive of the old designs painted on them. This painting of pictorial trays is an art fast dying out, but here and there a solitary worker carries on the tradition of the japanners' art. As in painting on pottery, tole, which afterward must be fired, is decorated with colors other than those which will eventually appear.

Not all the objects in tole, however, are dedicated to the past. Under the virile hand of modern designers lamps and boxes, flower vases and desk sets appear in new forms and brilliant colors. But there still lingers around these newly made wares, in spite of their twentieth century air, some of the charm that one may find in an ancient piece laboriously hammered out of iron and worked into shape by an eighteenth century craftsman.

THE demand for color in interiors has brought into popularity again after more than two hundred years the Chinese lacquered cabinets, tables and desks once found in English and French homes. Not that pieces of furniture decorated in the Oriental manner have ever disappeared—for connoisseurs have always valued them. But today more persons are finding out the charm of lacquered woodwork.

This extension of interest has been helped by alert designers using the Chinese chest or cabinet to encase the radio or phonograph. Also, when one has a Chinese rug on the floor, some bit of furniture reflecting the Orient seems called for, so that a decorative balance may be achieved in the room. And the surface of lacquered wood provides an interesting contrast to that of the plain woods of our more ordinary furniture.

Almost any type of room will welcome a bit of lacquer. It gives distinction, and often becomes the focal point for the decorative scheme of a whole interior. One may obtain a coffee table or a nest of small tables in red lacquer decorated with gold; there are the Queen Anne and other designs in the small secretary desks, and open cupboards for side walls and for corners, in unusual forms and lacquered in old greens and blues as well as in the traditional Chinese red. Pieces in the style of the last half of the seventeenth century and the first half of the eighteenth, which was roughly the age of lacquered furniture in England, are, of course, obtainable either in originals or in reproductions. Highboys and lowboys, dressing tables, mirrors, card tables, grandfather clocks and drop-front bookcase desks were ornamented in the Oriental manner. Modern forms of furniture with bright new lacquer are made for those who want furniture that reflects the present rather than the past.

But the most popular form of lacquered furniture today is in itself an Oriental contribution to Occidental furnishings. In the East it was a brass or iron bound chest, generally placed upon the floor. When it was adopted by Europeans a stand or table was provided—often of carved mahogany, walnut or gilded or silvered wood. Now, as in the past, the broad front and sides offer a tempting space for the decorator skilled in picturing pagodas, willow trees and stately mandarins, and the hinges, corner pieces and lock permit of an infinite variation of patterns.

Lacquered furniture first appeared in England when ships opened up trade with the East. Strange red gold panels were brought back, and English cabinetmakers incorporated them into various pieces of furniture. As the fashion developed, sometimes furniture was made up in England and then sent to the Orient to be decorated. The importation of Oriental-made furniture in the English style was, for a time afterward, a successful method of supplying the tremendous demand which had arisen for lacquered pieces. Then the Dutch discovered a method of making their own lacquer decoration in the Chinese fashion and from the Hollanders the art spread into France and England.

So great was the vogue about 1700 for this new style of ornamentation that amateurs tried their hand at the art. R. W. Symonds in his book "The Present State of Old English Furniture," speaks of a book published as early as 1688 for the guidance of the amateur decorator who made up his own lacquers and tried to imitate as best he could the secret process of the East.

The Occident never did find out or at least follow the method of lacquering of China and Japan, and one should not look for an exact replica of Eastern art either in medium or design in this lacquered furniture of today. The lacquered decoration of English craftsmen, upon which our designers base their practice, was indeed inspired by examples from the Orient, but in alien hands the decoration became often an erroneous although delightful and artistic translation of Chinese life and design.

The lacquer decorations of today, as of yesterday, are entirely hand work. This allows for variations in design. Variations in technique also exist, so that one may have a flat painted design, or a pattern in which the forms are raised, or the design may be incised, that is, the lines of the design may be cut in the lacquer. Combinations of all three of these techniques, which are traditional to the East, are used to give variety.

CLAY'S HOME FOR MUSEUM

was George Washington's, and here also are specimens of early American glass to delight the collector's heart. Parlor furniture and bedroom furniture are massive and imposing. The quaint washstand and the bowl and pitcher used by Henry Clay are preserved. And there are gifts and souvenirs and symbols of honor, bestowed by high authority, among them a wax miniature of himself presented by the ex-Emperor Iturbide to Henry Clay. But more interesting than silver, medal or miniature is the old high hat that was worn at Washington by the member from Ashland.

And it was to Ashland that Henry Clay retired after his defeat in 1844, at which time a letter written to him by Judge Adam Beatty contains reference to the sentiment generally understood to be felt by Henry Clay for his beloved acres: "Your failure has relieved you from a heavy responsibility, and I doubt not, in your retirement at Ashland, you will enjoy more real satisfaction than all of the honors the Presidential office could afford."

Ashland passed into the possession of Kentucky University when James B. Clay, the son of Henry Clay, died, and it was used as an adjunct to the military college. In 1882 it was purchased from the university by Major Henry Clay McDowell who, though a namesake of the "Great Commoner," was not related to him except through marriage—his wife being the granddaughter of Henry Clay. As the property now stands it is held in trust under the will of Major McDowell, who died in 1890, for the benefit of his children.

The Henry Clay Memorial Foundation, with Judge Samuel Wilson of Lexington as its President, has been incorporated to raise the necessary funds through a national subscription to purchase Ashland, so that it may be forever preserved from the spoliation of time and the exploitation of the realtor and give Kentucky a shrine to the memory of her illustrious son.

Domestic Science Teachers tell why they prefer Cream of Tartar Baking Powder

37 report, "It leaves no bitter taste"—"I prefer the flavor"

185 declare, "Results are better"—"Surer"

146 write, "No harmful residue"—"A healthful product"—"It is pure"

TEACHERS of Domestic Science in high schools all over the United States recently expressed opinions on baking powder and 88½% of those who made a definite choice said: "I prefer Cream of Tartar Baking Powder."

Then 358 of these experts gave specific reasons for their preference. "Better results," they said. "More healthful"—"purer"—"no bitter taste." These are the very reasons why particular housewives will use no other baking powder than Royal.

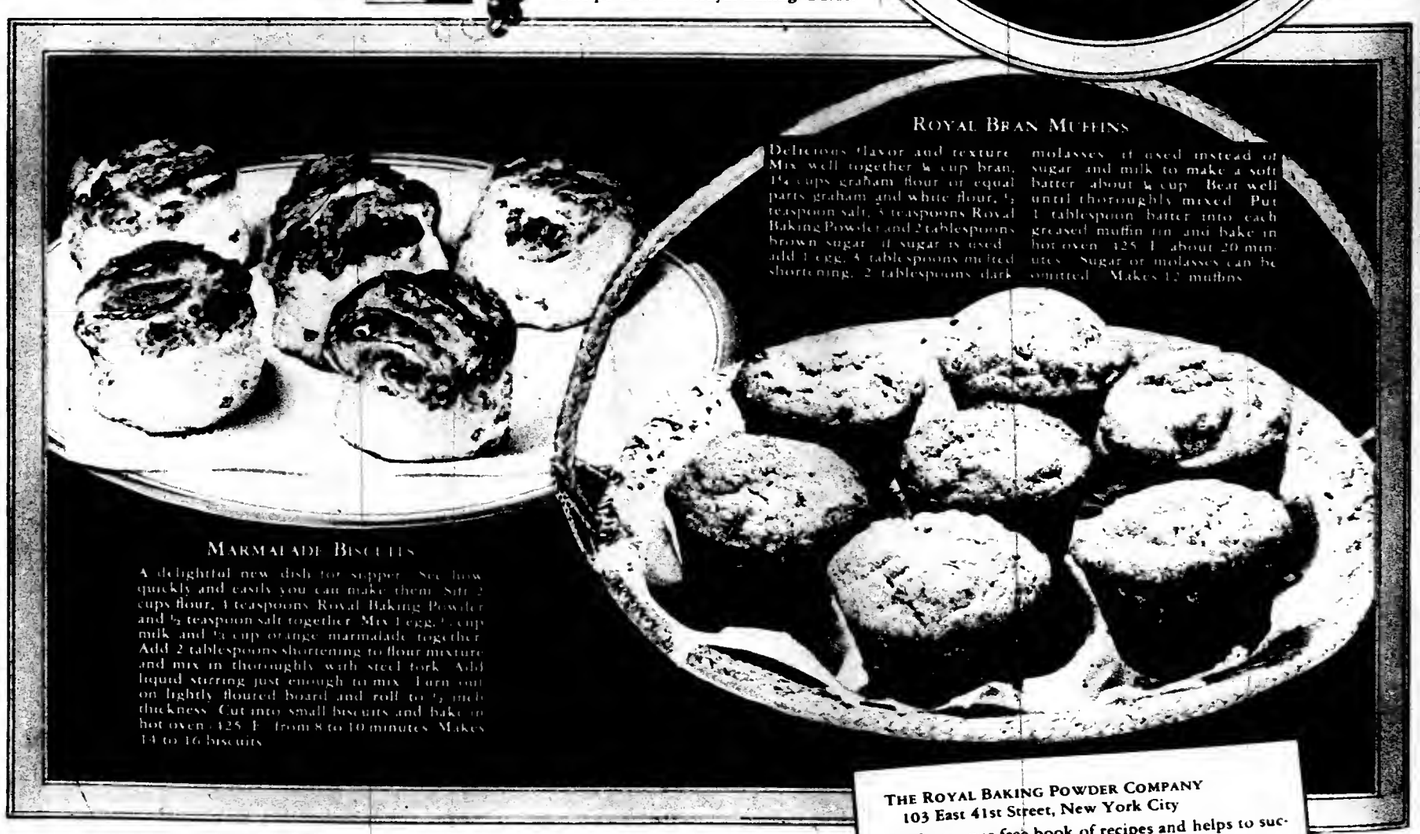
Royal is the Cream of Tartar Baking Powder; made with the finest cream of tartar, a pure fruit product from ripe grapes,—imported from Europe.

It cannot leave a bitter taste and it always leavens perfectly.

Free Offer: New recipes and wise little suggestions for success in baking are found in the Royal Baking Guide—sent free on request. Mail the coupon.

The Cream of Tartar Baking Powder. Contains no alum—leaves no bitter taste.

DEVIL'S FOOD CAKE
Voted the most popular cake in America.
Recipe is in the Royal Baking Guide.



ROYAL BRAN MUFFINS

Delicious flavor and texture. Mix well together ¼ cup bran, 1¼ cups graham flour or equal parts graham and white flour, ½ teaspoon salt, 3 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder and 2 tablespoons brown sugar if sugar is used. Add 1 egg, 4 tablespoons melted shortening, 2 tablespoons dark molasses if used instead of sugar and milk to make a soft batter about ¾ cup. Beat well until thoroughly mixed. Put 1 tablespoon batter into each greased muffin tin and bake in hot oven 425 F. about 20 minutes. Sugar or molasses can be omitted. Makes 12 muffins

MARMALADE BISCUITS

A delightful new dish for supper. See how quickly and easily you can make them. Sift 2 cups flour, 4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder and ½ teaspoon salt together. Mix 1 egg, ½ cup milk and ½ cup orange marmalade together. Add 2 tablespoons shortening to flour mixture and mix in thoroughly with steel fork. Add liquid stirring just enough to mix. Turn out on lightly floured board and roll to ½ inch thickness. Cut into small biscuits and bake in hot oven 425 F. from 8 to 10 minutes. Makes 14 to 16 biscuits

Wonderful

FRESH FRUIT FLAVOR

- from the fruit itself

Made from fresh fruit alone—these marvelous flavors that are simply delighting women everywhere!

"It smells and tastes like fresh fruit," they say. "I surely do like its fruity fragrance."

"My family like your wonderful Royal Fruit Gelatin very much—better than anything else."

WOMAN after woman writes enthusiastic praises of its fresh fruit fragrance, its natural fruit flavor.

For only from fresh fruit are these flavors made. From the pure juices of raspberries, strawberries, cherries, comes the delicious taste of Royal Raspberry, Strawberry, and Cherry. From the oils of real oranges and lemons, Royal Orange and Lemon derive their fresh, delicious flavor.

You can trust the purity and merit of Royal Fruit Gelatin, just as you have always trusted Royal Baking Powder.

Ask for it by name at your grocer's. Royal Fruit Flavored Gelatin. In the red package, the same color as the Royal Baking Powder can. You'll delight in its fresh fruit flavor.

"The ripe fruit smell and taste"

CHERRY JELLY WITH FRUIT SALAD: Dissolve 1 package Royal Cherry Gelatin in 1 cup boiling water. Add 1 cup cold water; mix and pour into shallow square pan that has been rinsed in cold water. Chill until firm; cut into cubes and serve in center of fruit salad. Garnish with cream mayonnaise.

Snug—Warm—and they STAY FASTENED!

these new buttonless leggings and sport blouses

NO more buttons to sew on or button holes to mend!

For here are drawer leggings and sport blouses made with the patented Hookless Fastener that takes the place of buttons and that lasts as long as the garments themselves.

It's so simple to work—just a pull down (or up). And it never sticks or rusts—always works with ease and speed. Children love to work it themselves. A special new snap fastens it firmly so it can't come loose no matter how strenuous the play!

Zip-On Leggings and Sport Blouses are smart-looking, well-cut and accurately sized so they're sure to be comfortable—never binding or baggy. They are made of nationally known materials, all sturdy and enduring—Waterside Corduroy, Suede Like, Jersey Cloth and Moleskin.

In Corduroy, Jersey Cloth and Moleskin they come in Brown, Camels Hair, Grey, Navy, and White. In Suede Like, they come in White, French Blue, Poppy Red, Camels Hair, Reindeer, African, Navy, Grey, Copenhagen, Terra Cotta and Emerald. Sizes are from 1 to 12 years.

If your dealer cannot supply you, write us the size, color and material you desire and we will see that you are supplied.

The lovely smiling MOUTH of YOUTH

How proud and confident you are when your mouth and breath are always fresh and sweet as a child's!

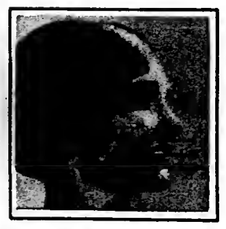
Yours always if you keep the tiny Mouth Glands young

SO much depends on keeping six little glands in your mouth always active. They pour out natural fluids that protect teeth from decay.

But, unless we watch out, the mouth glands slow up. The formula to correct this was worked out in Pebeco Tooth Paste.

Brush your teeth with Pebeco. Instantly you get the sharp clean tang that leaves the whole mouth tingling and refreshed. The mouth glands are restored to normal vigor. The fluids they pour out cleanse and protect the teeth even where the tooth brush cannot reach. Use Pebeco daily to keep your whole mouth wholesome always.

Made only by Pebeco, Inc., a division of Lehn & Fink Products Company. Sole distributors: Lehn & Fink, Inc., Bloomfield, N. J. In the blue tube, at all druggists.



Where the mouth glands are. Keep them always working!

The numbers show where they are three on each side. The mouth glands are 20 times more active when we chew – but our soft foods do not exercise them. They slow up and decay begins. Pebeco contains an important salty-tasting ingredient that restores their youthful action.

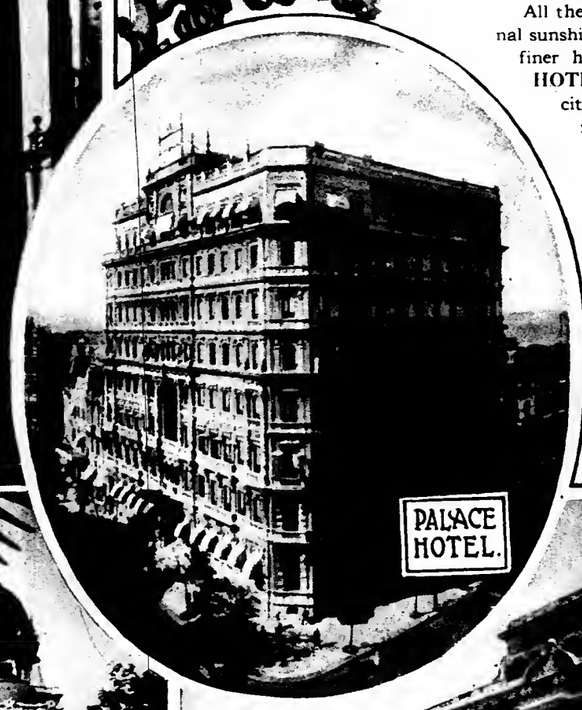
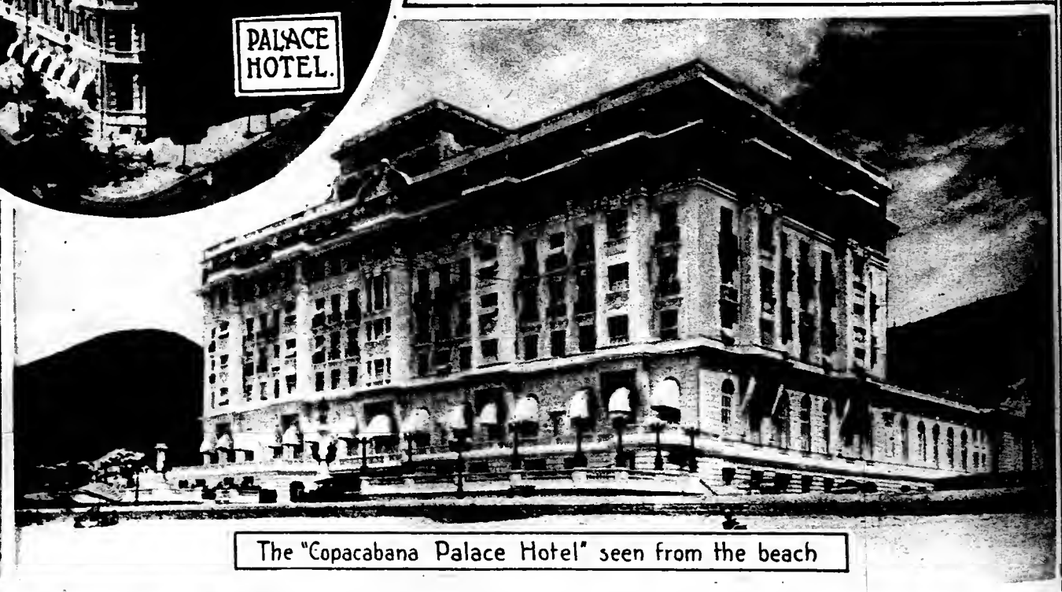
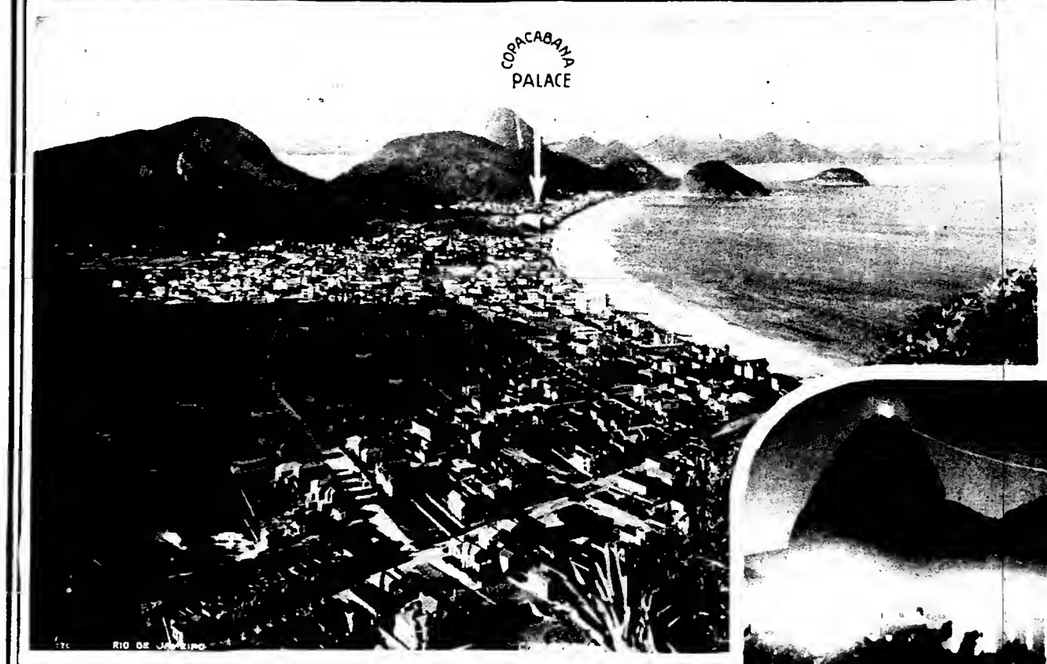
See the world's most gorgeous city—

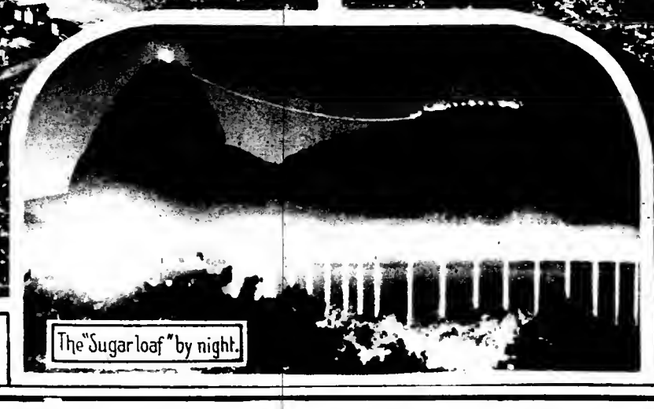
Rio de Janeiro.







The aristocratic suburb of "Copacabana".



View of Rio from the peak "Corcovado".

IF you could roll into one all the beautiful spots of the globe, you would not produce a place of the overwhelming splendour of Rio de Janeiro, the capital of Brazil.

Majestic rocky mountains, sapphire seas of rare transparency breaking on snowy white beaches, all the opulence of a tropical flora under turquoise skies, and in the midst of this incomparable panorama Rio de Janeiro with its fashionable Boulevards contrasted by delightful streets with quaint churches and buildings and all the old-world charm of its ancient Latin civilization.

The surrounding country abounds with excellent roads leading through indescribably beautiful scenery. Neither words nor pictures can give the slightest idea of the exquisite views spread before the automobilist.

Get away from the beaten tracks and the stale pleasures of Europe and come to the new-world Paris, Rio de Janeiro, where you can enjoy yourself free from all restrictions.

It is the consensus of opinion of the most experienced travellers that nowhere can be found so cosmopolitan and fashionable a gathering as in the magnificent Casino at the Copacabana Palace, which offers all the attractions of Monte Carlo. Here, too, you may observe the most extraordinary display of jewelry, as the Brazilian woman is not only famous for her elegance and beauty, but for wearing the largest diamonds in the world.

All the wonders of this exotic paradise, with its perfect climate and eternal sunshine, can be enjoyed in the most luxurious comfort. For there are no finer hotels—not even in America—than the COPACABANA PALACE HOTEL, directly situated at a most perfect beach on the fringe of the city, or the PALACE HOTEL in the very heart of Rio's most modern district.

To those who like a little business lining to their recreation, it might be interesting that many an American who came here for pleasure remained for profit—so vast and manifold are the possibilities of this incredibly rich and practically undeveloped country.

Rio can be reached rapidly on the excellent Munson and Lamport & Holt Liners which equal the finest ships in the Atlantic service.

Determine to see Rio in the coming months and write at once for further information and a beautifully illustrated booklet of Rio de Janeiro to the Brazilian Consul-General, 17 State Street, New York.

THE PARAMOUNT BUILDING AND THEATRE

At the "Cross Roads of the World," this towering edifice stands as a monument to the fourth greatest industry of the United States and houses the world's finest theatre. It is the home of Famous Players-Lasky Corp., Producers of Paramount Pictures. The building rises to a height of 35 stories, with an observation tower 400 feet above Broadway. A huge ball at the top of the tower represents the world, and lights the hours marked by the gigantic tower clock. This can be seen for miles. The Theatre which is the home of Publix Theatres, and the key theatre of the entire Publix circuit will be dedicated during the great Broadway Celebration, November 17, 18 and 19.

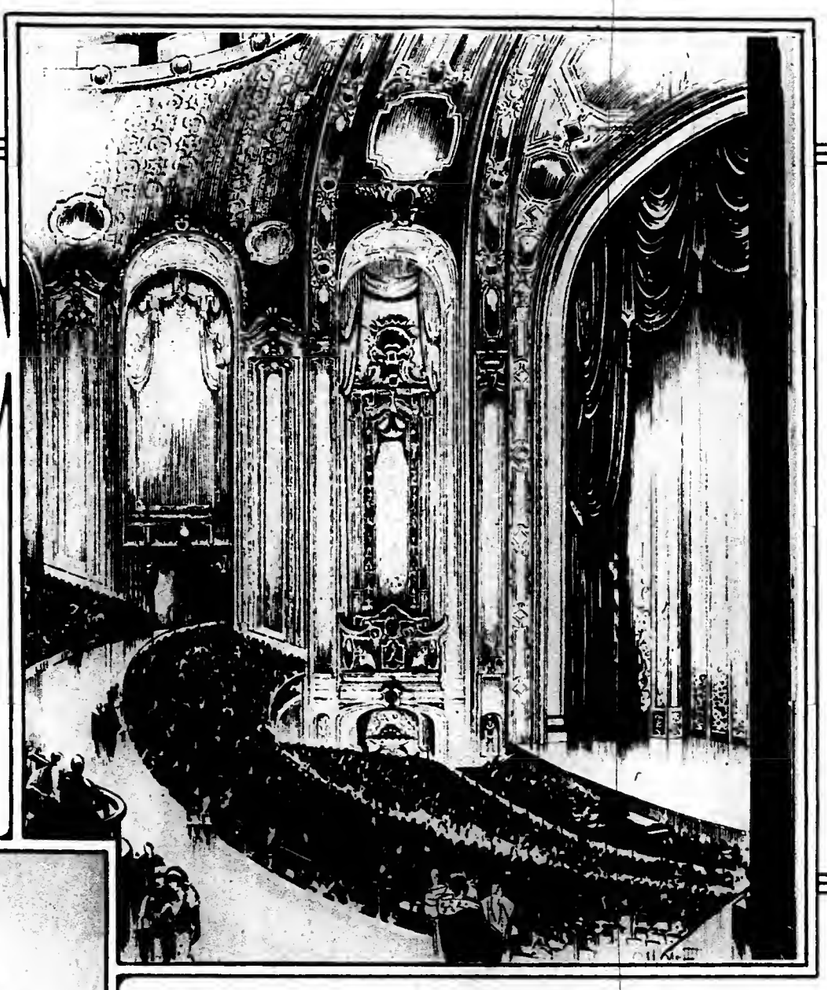
The Hall of Nations is one of the Impressive features of the Paramount Theatre, and will be dedicated by Government officials and Ambassadors of the countries represented on November 23rd.



AN IMPRESSION OF THE GREAT AUDITORIUM OF THE PARAMOUNT THEATRE

The magnificent auditorium of the Paramount theatre, which seats four thousand persons, rises to a height of ten stories from the orchestra floor to the Aerial Promenade which surrounds the great dome. The decorative scheme is of the French Renaissance, that most luxurious period in history. Priceless paintings and rare art objects decorate its walls and sit in intimate niches. The equipment of the stage represents the last word in stagecraft. The organ is the largest and finest in the world, while a great symphony orchestra rises like magic from the pit, takes its position on the stage and disappears at the will of the director. The first stage presentation will he made by John Murray Anderson and the first picture will be, of course, a Paramount Picture.

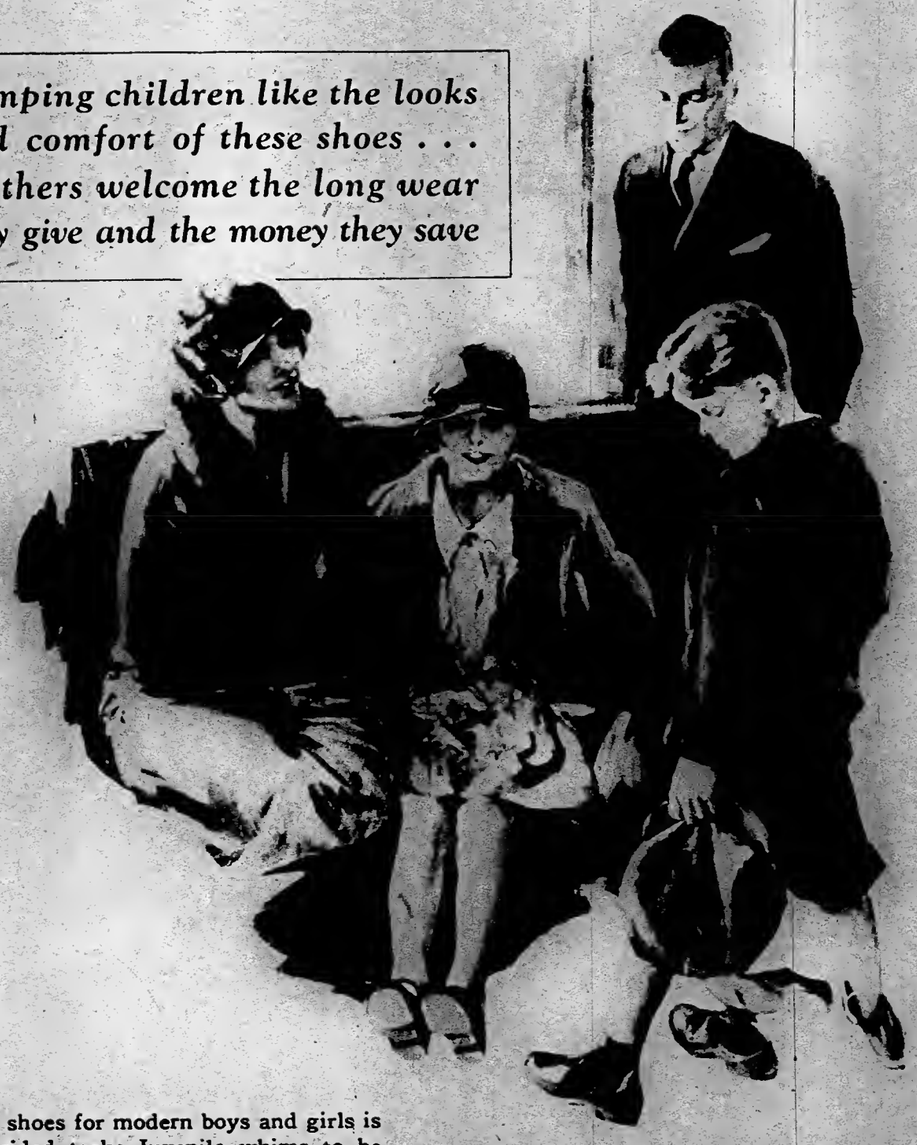
Romping children like the looks and comfort of these shoes . . . Mothers welcome the long wear they give and the money they save



BUYING shoes for modern boys and girls is a many-sided task: Juvenile whims to be satisfied. Growing feet to be thought about. Sensible dress-up to be considered. And the family shoe budget to be kept within reasonable limits.

Haven't you often hoped that some day you might be able to buy children's shoes really made with all these things in mind? . . . Shoes in which good looks, correct design, long wear and money-saving price are combined. Try Endicott-Johnson shoes. Then watch your shoe bills come down.

Endicott-Johnson specialize in children's shoes. We make more than fifteen million pairs a year—one pair out of every seven worn by American boys and girls.

They're tested shoes—based on intimate study of what happens to shoes on the feet of active youngsters. They're made from specially tanned leather; and put together with particular thought of what they're going to be up against.

And with good wear you also get fine style, comfortable lasts (designed for growing feet), beautiful finishes—shoes you'll be proud to have your children wear.

See the splendid new styles—for men and women as well as for boys and girls. Leading stores everywhere sell Endicott-Johnson shoes. If you don't know of one nearby, ask us.

Boys' and girls' shoes, $3, $4, $5. Smaller sizes proportionately less. The Endicott-Johnson trade-mark is on the sole. Write for free booklet, "The World at Play," for boys, girls and grown-ups. If your house is cold don't blame your BOILER

ASK your neighborhood Heating and Plumbing Shop for Hoffman No. 2 Vacuum Valves. You can identify them by the orange and black individual containers in which they are packed.

Put Hoffman Vacuum Valves on your radiators—save 1-3 of your fuel and have continuous heating comfort

WHETHER your steam heating plant is new or old, Hoffman No. 2 Vacuum Valves will make an amazing difference in your comfort. They make stubborn radiators heat quickly. They speed up heat so that every morning you get up in a warm cozy house. At night radiators keep hot long after fires are banked. Your struggles to secure continuous heating comfort are over. You control your house temperature to meet outside weather conditions as easily as you control the speed of your car, and best of all, you have this amazing comfort with 1/3 less fuel.

Hoffman No. 2 Vacuum Valves let air out of radiators then keep it out. That is the whole story. Steam is generated with smaller fires when air pressure is less because the system is operating under a partial vacuum. When radiators are once hot, they stay hot for hours. At night when fires are banked, a vacuum is created because no air can rush in through the valves to occupy the space left vacant by the steam as it condensed. The radiators will consequently heat up quickly in the morning and without any hissing or banging or spitting of water onto floors or draperies.

Any one-pipe steam system, new or old, will be wonderfully improved with Hoffman No. 2 Vacuum Valves. It only requires an hour or two to change every valve in your house and to tighten up the system generally. There is no dirt, no noise, no confusion.

You can easily save enough fuel in a single winter to pay for them. They require no adjustments. They are guaranteed for five years of satisfactory operation.

STEINWAY

THE INSTRUMENT OF THE IMMORTALS

THE STEINWAY

EVERY prospective buyer of a piano should know these facts: The Steinway family own and control the Steinway organization. For more than 75 years, four generations of this family have devoted their lives to perfecting the Steinway piano. In fact, most of the important improvements marking the progress of the piano industry originated and were developed in the Steinway workshops.

Every Steinway piano embodies the most advanced and scientific principles. Every Steinway piano represents nearly six years of preparation and construction. Every Steinway piano is sold at the lowest possible price, as a matter of principle. From the beginning of this business, there has always existed a reasonable relation between the cost of manufacture and the selling price of the Steinway piano.

And when you consider the long term of service that every Steinway returns to its owner —20, 30 or even 40 years—the reasons for its overwhelming success become even clearer. For this amazing durability places the Steinway definitely among the least expensive of all pianos. And it makes the purchase of a Steinway piano a logical and profitable transaction for people of modest means and limited incomes.

Such facts establish the actual worth of the Steinway, and prove the generous return that every Steinway makes to its owner. But what of the outstanding musical qualities—the tone, the response to the hand and spirit of the musician, the ability to mirror every subtle expression of the pianist? . . . To these questions the Steinway has not one answer, but hundreds . . . for Paderewski, Rachmaninoff, Hofmann and Mero speak for the Steinway . . . celebrated singers, conductors, violinists and composers write its praise . . . almost every musician of note during the past 75 years has preferred it . . . and all these hundreds of notable figures have put the final seal of their approval on the Steinway by choosing it for use and ownership.

If you will keep an open mind when you choose your piano, you will find that anyone who can afford a piano can afford a Steinway . . . that any one of the many styles and sizes meets every requirement of the musician . . . and finally, that ever-reasonable prices and convenient terms bring the Steinway well within the reach of every true lover of music.

Any Steinway piano may be purchased with a cash deposit of 10%, and the balance will be extended over a period of two years

PLAYS AND PLAYERS OF THE MID-NOVEMBER STAGE

MOLNAR IN MINIATURE

Self-Portraiture in the Informal Fantasy of "The Play's the Thing—"—Qualities Of This Man of the Theatre

By J. BROOKS ATKINSON.

HAVING rubbed bare most of the familiar patterns for play composition and having come to no lucid understanding of the esoteric perplexities of life, Ferenc Molnar now indulges himself in a dramatic causerie, a fireside fable, entitled in good Shakespearean English, "The Play's the Thing—." It is a matter well suited to this famous Hungarian. For some thirty years Molnar has behaved himself extremely well as a craftsman for the theatre. He has written in three rigid acts according to honorable convention, as every respectable dramatist must; and even in the moulding construction of "Liliom" he dutifully remembered in his intelligible technique the stupid prejudices of audiences. Whatever you think of his dramas, whatever you think of the only gibes he drops like a rosebud in passing, you find his plays ably conducted for acting in the theatre. "The Phantom Rival," "The Swan," "Passions for Men," "The Guardsman," "The Glass Slipper"—they were all in good dramatic taste, neatly written, intensely cynical, sophisticated, original and expressive.

Now, excepting Bernard Shaw, for whom all general laws are wisely suspended, the dramatist is strangely circumscribed in his contact with audiences. Unlike the prose writer whose little conceits appear in print, he cannot strew the capital "I" through his works imposingly and parade his vanity for all who are kind enough to look. Dinners and digestions affect him quite as much as the writer. Why should he remain dumb? Why should he not tell what he likes for breakfast, what days of the week he knows to be lucky, what marvelous secrets he knows of his craft, what stupendous fame he enjoys—in short, why should his personal importance be ignored? Alas, the expression of all he writes falls from the clumsy lips of another person—a hired actor, a mountebank, who also has dinners and digestions to upset him or to put him in fine fettle. In the creation of characters, in the design of plots and in the style of his dialogue, the dramatist may express all that he feels about life, even about the enthusiasms of living; but who wins the applause? Whose personality draws the personal acclaim? Occasionally, in response to cries of "author," the dramatist may stand, obsequiously, shame-faced, before the footlights and speak his thanks, though much less brilliantly than the polished actors who have just preceded him. Beside them, what an awkward curmudgeon he seems to be! And no one but his hang-dog wife knows what he likes for breakfast or how his digestion is behaving.

AMONG the characters of "The Play's the Thing—" Sandor Turai, dramatist extraordinary, is described in the dimensions of superman—never aggressive nor threatening, in the Nietzschean sense, but kindly, wise and superior. For him all the other persons of the play, from collaborator to prima donna, are puppets to toy with disdainfully, with a gleam of sympathy in his eyes. "Life isn't all theatre," Mansky observes. "Yes, it is, if you write plays," Turai replies. Being merely human, all these earthlings get into trouble more or less. The young composer overhears boudoir conversation between his fiancée and a middle-aged voluptuary, grave in its import; naturally his helpless mind runs toward suicide. When she learns that she has been discovered, this unfaithful fiancée in turn dares not look the future in the face. The voluptuary, a husband and a father, with a reputation to preserve, is at his wits' end. In sum, for all these purely human characters the situation is not merely desperate, but hopeless, a muddle beyond repair. Explanations cannot explain away those intimate boudoir entreaties; nor can apologies suffice for shattered illusions. The golden bowl is quite broken.

But Sandor Turai, it has been said, is a superman to whom no human problem defies solution. "A playwright is either a playwright, or he isn't," Turai remarks conclusively. Already we have seen him the master of men in a Riviera castle, above the petty embroils of human beings, unepeakably, supremely wise—the very quintessence of understanding. Emotions sweep the others off their feet. But nothing disturbs his heroic equanimity. While they are tossing on their beds of anguish he quietly sits down with pen and paper to put together the fragments of the young composer's romance. Specifically he writes a one-act play to include all those intimate words overheard from the chamber next door. When, therefore, the young composer hears them as lines in a dull playlet the next evening, spoken on a make-shift stage by his fiancée and the voluptuary as actors, his confidence is immeasurably restored and his love burns with fresh ardor. How could he have doubted her! Only think that she had been rehearsing her part in the little play. The tender words she had uttered in her chamber were no more than a playwright's fancy. During the reconciliation Sandor Turai regards the jubilant scene between these crazy humans with unobtrusive pleasure; from on high he sees everything that he has made, and, behold, it is very good. Who is this urbane emissary of the gods? Ah, who but Molnar himself!

IN the simple construction of "The Play's the Thing—" Molnar has broken down the usual formality that keeps audience and playwright apart. During the first moments of the comedy Sandor Turai and his two satellites introduce themselves to the audience by telling their names, ages, places of birth and general condition of servitude. At the close of the second act each one in turn proposes a suitable climax before the most effective one actually rings the curtain down. Throughout the comedy, the contact with the audience is a delightful combination of illusion and reality, now play and now conversation, a fabric of many colors running fast together. All the parts in this new production are played capitally, with Mr. Blinn, Mr. Owen and Mr. Nairn excelling. And the performance runs off into ripples of amusement, guffawe and hilarious laughter.

To be more specific, "The Play'e the Thing—" is written by a superb playwright who—like his prototype, Sandor Turai—sees life and individuals in terms of the theatre, and who understands perfectly the fragile relation between character, situation and audience. Keenly as Molnar must have enjoyed the creation of this fluffy bauble, he wrote it no less for the enjoyment of audiences. Long years of experience have given him that supreme dramatic sense of anticipating, before production, the effect of situation in the theatre. He knows how to break down the resistance of an audience, how to surprise it, with a quick twist of the plot, how to tickle it with subtle quips or blatant "gags," how to surfeit it with amusement in the last scenes, so that, whatever the first impressions may have been, it will go home in a pleasant frame of mind. Throughout the vagaries of "The Play'e the Thing—" the situation is uncommonly fragile. Molnar always keeps it in perfect dramatic balance.

BEING a man of the theatre who has no other life and who regards everything human as grist for the footlight mill, Molnar never strays far from the foyer of the playhouse. Amid the sociological bravura of Shaw, Galsworthy, Werfel, or the nationalism of Tchekhov, or the remote cerebralism of Benavente or Pirandello, Molnar would be ill at ease. Once in "Liliom" he strode defiantly into heaven with all the swank of a braggart. "A lot they know!" his hero snorted contemptuously. And for once this monocled arbiter elegantiarum of the green room ran before the buoyant wind of imagination. What an alluring pla; it was—a vision of far-off things no less than vigorous characterization of a broad-chested juggernaut hero. With Joseph Schildkraut swaggering through the major rôle and Eva Le Gallienne clinging determinedly to his flapping coat-tails "Liliom" shot through the clouds. Molnar has not mounted Pegasus again to clatter off into the blue of the empyrean.

We are to think of him as the puppet master who prefers incandescent light to the sunshine out of doors. Strange things are said of his scheme of life. While human beings sweat in the market place it is said that he sleeps in a darkened room in an exotically decorated apartment. At 10 in the evening, when weary laborers have gone to bed, he dresses and strolls to the "Ottion," his favorite club in Budapest. For weeks on end he scribbles notes for his next play and gifts his characters through the fine mesh of his worldly personality. When the time for serious work arrives he shuts himself up in a dimly lighted workroom to whip his notes into dramatic form, imported cigars and expensive coffee soothing and stimulating his nerves in succession. Occasionally he slips mysteriously through the iniquitous dens of the rabble in search of crude material. It is whispered that, broad as his acquaintance may be, he has no intimate friends: like Sandor Turai, he sets up an unseen but impregnable wall between himself and his associates. In "The Play's the Thing—" his voice seems a trifle weary; like Anatole France, he is the observer in an ivory tower, lonely but sympathetic. On every side rise the high walls of his little kingdom of the theatre; he is too fatigued to climb up and peer into the green secrets of the world outside. One does not look to him for a dramatic renaissance in which the lusty youth of Hungary will carry his blood-red ensign through the fray. Such jejune dramas as he writes now leave only the piquant, dry aroma of their humor and skill. In "The Play'e the Thing—" he has walked up close to the footlights, but not across them into the orchestra pit. In this idealized portrait of himself he still holds himself imperceptibly aloof.

MR. SHAW DISCUSSES PLAYHOUSES AND PLAYS

The following article was written by Mr. Shaw when the Guild opened its new theatre, and for some strange reason has lain buried under the masonry all this time. It has been exhumed, by a strange coincidence, just as the Guild is in the act of presenting Mr. Shaw's "Pygmalion."

By GEORGE BERNARD SHAW.

THERE is no doubt at all in my mind that the Theatre Guild should have a new theatre.

And by a new theatre I mean a new theatre and not another old theatre. The nineteenth century has left our cities stuffed with pestiferous playgoer barrels in which the unfortunate playwrights and actors were expected by sheer force of entertaining power to set up an attraction that would counterbalance the greatest discomfort of the greatest number. There is a tradition of discomfort in the theatre dating back to a time when ground rents, which now make it compulsory, were comparatively negligible. In Shakespeare'e time it seemed a matter of course that playgoers should stand staring at the stage without a roof over their heads, as they do still at a Punch and Judy show. A seat was a privilege to be hired as one hires a trestle at a race to look over the heads of those in front. To this day in the Italian theatres you pay for ingress to the theatre and then pay for your seat in addition as a separate transaction. In Pepys's time the money was still collected from the spectators Punch and Judy fashion at the end of the first act. Within my recollection Shakespeare'e seatless groundlings were provided with plain wooden benches only, though, to be sure, they were roofed in. There were no stalls, and there was half price after 9 o'clock. In the old Theatre Royal, Duhlin, a first-rate house of its kind, there was, besides the dress circle and the undress circle for the aristocracy and the bourgeoisie 4s and 3s, the pit at 2s, a middle gallery at 18d and a top gallery or gods at eixpence. Nohody dreamed of comfort or expected it, though in the circles there was grandeur, consisting of red stuffed upholstery on the narrow benches. It was the business of the play and of the actors to hold you spellbound and forgetful. And this was not for a mere two and a half or three hours. The first time I was ever in a theatre the program consisted of a farce, Tom Taylor'e drama, "Plot and Passion," in three acts, a grand Christmas pantomime, and probably another farce which I was not allowed to wait for. Most of the spectators were seated on narrow planks, without cushions, eides or backs; hut they stuck it out like the French at Verdun, except that they did it voinntarily and paid for the privilege. Such feats of endurance are not things of the past. They are surpassed every eeason in London hy infatuated people who wait at the theatre doors for eight, twelve and sometimes actually twenty hours to secure front places on occasions like the return of Melba the other day, creating nnmentioneble probleme of provision and sanitation. Every night the devoted theatre queues may be seen in London, beginning to form three hours before the opening without extraordinary provocation.

Having discovered that people will perform these feats of self-torture as resolutely as the Indian fanatics who swing on hooks, or the early Christian ascetics, the theatre managers and their architects have naturally concluded that comfort is thrown away on playgoers. A theatre is therefore regarded as a palace of enchantment, but not as a prosaically comfortable place. If criminals were crowded together in our prisone without proper ventilation and elbow room, as playgoers are in our theatres, there would he an agitation against the cruelty of ths authorities. In many London theatres the $3 stalls are so closely packed that the back of each etall overhangs the knees of the person in the etall behind it. The gymnastice of the later comers, who have to choose between pulling over the stall in front of them as they cling to it and crashing into the laps of those already seated behind them, are familiar to every playgoer.

I am in favor of making the playgoer comfortable. I admit that once you get him into the theatre he will endure anything, and that if you give him good drama and acting you give him, in effect, a chloroform that would make him forget St. Lawrence'e gridiron if he happened to be sitting on it. But the difficulty is to get him in. If a good play makes him forget his discomfort, a bad one makes him remember it and fear it next time. He craves for the comfort of the cinema theatres, the best of which are made very comfortable because, as they are seldom full, nor even expected to be full, and pay quite handsomely when they are what the manager of an ordinary theatre would call empty, the temptation to peck the seats together without regard to the comfort of the sitters is less strong than the desire to court their custom. Besides, the cinema relisves the spectator of all preoccupying and worrying self-consciousness—about his drese, for instance—whereas the ordinary theatre, the moment it takes its glaring lights off the actors, turne them full onto the hlushing spectators. This factor in the euccess of the cinema is of enormous importance; hut it is so littis talked about that I should not be surprised if some idiot were to invent a means of making the screen visible in a fully lighted auditorium, and be hailed as a deliverer by the industry he was trying to ruin.

For the moment, however, people go to the picture place oftener than to the theatre because they are more comfortable and less conspicuous there, and to meet this competition we of the regular theatre need to demolish most of our existing playhouses and replace them with etructures in which the audience is comfortable and obscure and the etage blazingly conspicuous.

But there is another condition to be fulfilled. The cinema has restored to the etage the dramatic form used by Shakespeare: the story told with utter disregard of the unity of place in a rapid succession of scenes, practically unlimited in number, uninterrupted by waits and jnst as short or as long as their dramatic interest can bear. In this free, varied, continuous manner, almost any one who can tell a etory well can also write a play. The specific ingenuity needed to force the story into the strait waistcoat of three or five acts, with one unchanging scene to each, is no longer needed. The classic unities have their value for those who can handle them and are

THE WEEK'S EVENTS

PYGMALION—Tomorrow night at the Guild Theatre. A revival of the Shaw play, first acted here eleven years ago. Lynn Fontanne will have the rôle that was then Mrs. Campbell'e; others in the cast will include Reginald Mason, J. W. Austin, Beryl Mercer, Henry Travers and Charles Courtneidge.

A PROUD WOMAN—Tomorrow night at the Maxine Elliott Theatre. A comedy by Arthur Richman—much compared, hy those who have seen it out of town, with "Craig's Wife." The players will include Florence Eldridge, Elizabeth Risdon, Margaret Wycherly, Anne Morrison, John Mareton, Percy Ames and Herbert Yost.

GERTIE—Tomorrow night at the Bayes Theatre. A play by Tadema Bussiere, with a cast including Constance McKay, Pat O'Brien and Edward Reese.

LILY SUE—Tuesday night at the Lyceum Theatre. Willard Mack ie the author of this play, a melodrama of the West in the distant '90s. Mr. Belasco is the producer and Beth Merrill and Mr. Mack himself will head the cast. Still others will include Curtis Cooksey and William Courtleigh.

TWINKLE, TWINKLE—Tuesday night at the Liberty Theatre. A musical comedy hy Harlan Thompson and Harry Archer, with additional scenee and music hy Bert Kalmar and Harry Ruby. The principals will include Joe E. Brown, Ona Munson and Alan Edwards.

THE WITCH—Thursday night at the Greenwich Village Theatre. Alice Brady in a play hy John Masefield, adapted from the Norwegian of H. Wiere-Jenssen. Hugh Huntley, David Landau and Maria Ouspenskaya will also be in the cast.

ADDENDA

Raquel Meller will give her final recital of the season at Henry Miller's tonight.

Ruth Draper, in addition to her recital at the Selwyn Theatre tonight, will likewise appear on Tuesday and Friday afternoons thie week.

The schedule of the Civic Repertory Theatre will be as follows: Tomorrow night, "John Gabriel Borkman"; Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday nights, "Three Sisters"; Wednesday afternoon, "The Master Builder"; Wednesday and Friday nights and Saturday afternoon, "Saturday Night."

"The Lion Tamer" will be acted through Wednesday at the Neighborhood Playhouse, and "The Little Clay Cart" for the balance of the week.

GOSSIP OF THE RIALTO

"Sunny" Nearing the End—The Usual Cry Of Bad Times—Mr. Carrillo Goes to Work—Sundry Items

THE sensational "Sunny," whose continuous record of high receipts is probably unequaled in this town—one must make all statements appertaining to the box-office with qualifications, since regiments of press agents stand ready to write indignant letters of correction—the sensational "Sunny," let it he repeated, will probably end its engagement at the New Ameterdam on Jan. 15. It will then have played eome sixty-nine weeks (if by any chance the number is eeventy the producer's letter ehould reach this office not later than noon tomorrow). Doubtless it could go on and on, but greater profits await it in the hinterland, and Mr. Dillingham, moreover, will be ready with another production for the New Amsterdam. (It might also be noted, in so far as the New Amsterdam Theatre is concerned, that it is Mr. Dillingham rather than Mr. Ziegfeld who is now the favorite son of the Erlanger office.)

And so "Sunny" will go to Boston, and Mr. Dillingham will next offer at the New Amsterdam a show which will have Mary Eaton, Walter Catlett, Skeets Gallagher and probably Paul Whiteman and his band in the company. Mr. Kern has written the music, Mr. Harbach and Miss Caldwell the jokes and lyrics. Rehearsals are already under way.

In the meantime Miss Lillie'e musical ehow, "Oh, Please," will open tomorrow night in Philadelphia. True, an identic announcement was made in thie column last week—the seeming error, however, was due to a late change of plane on the part of Mr. Dillingham. The week of the 29th, if all goes well, will find the Lillie show in New York.

There is a nation-wide slump in the theatres at present—unexplainable, for the most part. Chicago is conspicuously in the grip of it and here in New York a few of the big successes are said to have experienced the novelty of empty seats on recent evenings.

Leo Carrillo, qniescent in recent monthe, has been engaged by the Shnberts for a French play that will etart rehearsing this week. The play's original title is "M. le Cure"—an English equivalent has not yet been selected. "Mr. Preacher" is a ehade too unthinkable.

It was Miss Peggy Wood, at present deep in rehearsals of "The Nightingale," who recently rose from the luncheon table and paused to deliver a mot before departure. "Well," she remarked, "back to the mimee."

Incidentally, the name of Thomas A. Wise appears in the cast of "The Nightingale." And, since Miss Wood's rôle therein ie that of Jenny Lind, it eeems reasonahly certain that Mr. Wise's is that of P. T. Barnum.

Miss Brice and "Fanny," patently a disappointment, departed from the Lyceum last night after an engagement of some eight weeks. It is thought likely, however, that the combined namee of Mr. Belasco and Miss Brice will make for patronage on tour. The Theatre Guild also fared none too well with "Juarez and Maximilian," and allotted it the minimum period. Mr. McEvoy's "The Go-Getters," after an added week'e grace, was scheduled to expire at the Maxine Elliott, and "Happy-Go-Lucky" went forth from ths Liberty. Mr. Langner's "Henry—Behave" closed at the Bayes Theatre after a moderate engagement.

The definite commitments for the week of the 22d are these:

Irene Bordoni in "Mozart," Monday, at the Music Box.

"Up the Line," Monday, at the Morosco.

"Ned McCobb's Daughter," Monday, at the John Golden.

"The Mistress of the Inn," Monday, at the Fourteenth Street.

"This Was a Man," Tuesday, at the Klaw.

"The Strange Prince," Tuesday, at the Booth (matinees only).

For possibilities there is the play called "Sisters" (formerly "Sisters Three") and "Glamour," a war play from London.

"The Sin of Sins," which is Mr. Woods's new name for the play originally called "Hymn to Venus," was received with only moderate enthusiasm in Chicago last Monday. There eeems likewise to be some doubt about "Wooden Kimono," tried out in Atlantic City during the past week.

Various other new plays are popping up here and there, in sundry states of preparation. (One out-of-town opening of the week was dismissed with a paragraph hy one reviewer, on the ground that production and performance were both so ill-prepared that it was impossihle to form a judgment.) A play which used to be known as "The Leap," hut which is now called "In This Room," will open tonight in Chicago. Edward Locke is the author, and Louis Wolhelm and Donald Gallaher will be in the cast. "Thie Woman Business," something from England, will open tomorrow night in Boston, for four weeks' stay. Frank Craven's comedy, "Coal Oil Jennie," is working its way east after a Chicago run, and will doubtless open in New York sooncr or later. Cincinnati saw it last week. "Mozart," hitherto referred to, will have its first American performance in Baltimore tomorrow night, and "Sisters" will be ceen in Atlantic City.

Further news of "Mozart" is that it reqnires an orchestra of thirty-one, a circumstance which will require the removal of an entire row of seats at the Music Box. That opulent playhouse, incidentally, is now enjoying a period of idleness after the first failure of its golden career.

The news of the week had it that the Theatre Guild is about to relinquish the Garrick Theatre—has already relinquished it, for all practical purposes. It is a parting which might properly be accompanied by a dash of sentiment, hut the Gnild is now among the higgest of the producers, and it was cold logic which prevailed in the formal announcement of the separation. The Garrick is now too small, and there you are. In its place the Guild has taken over the new John Golden Theatre in West Fifty-eighth Street, a playhouse which, incidentally, is not so much higger than the Garrick. There has been no announcement, as yet, that it is to be called the Helen Westley.

Miss Eagels is resting from her final and arduous tour in "Rain," and it will be another two weeks before she begins rehearsals in "Chicago." The play ie scheduled to come to New York the second week in January.

Now that Miss Eagels has declared for "Chicago" instead of "The Garden of Eden," it will be Mr. Woods instead of Mr. Harris who will produce the latter piece, although one may assume that Mr. Harris retains an interest. The play will open in Atlantic City on Jan. 3. In the meantime, word comes that Tallulah Bankhead—of course—will act the leading rôle in London.

It seems likely that Frank Keenan will not be acting in "Black Velvet" when that play is finally produced here, although no reasen is advanced for his prospective absence. The play, which enjoyed a success in Chicago, is due in January.

"LeMaire's Affairs," the revue which has been attracting sensational trade in Chicago since early in the Summer, is about ready to leave that town. It will not come to New York, however, until some time in February, when it is said to be booked for the Martin Beck Theatre. Its cautious producer, Mr. LeMaire, is inclined to believe that the revue competition at that date will be a little less keen. In the interim the prodnction will be continued on tour.

The cast of "Peggy," due at the Vanderbilt Theatre around Christmas time, will include Ada Mae, Lulu McConnell, Edith Meiser and Betty Starbuck—the last two out of "The Garrick Gaieties."

The eecond "Cradle Snatchers" company, which closed on tour a few weeks ago, hae reopened, and is heading for Boeton. Meanwhile, the first company will reach Chicago just before Christmas, and another organization is highly successful in Los Angeles.

Anne Nichols, who is still engaged in the amiable pastime of trying to find another play that will be one-tenth so successful as "Able's Irish Rose"—amiable, of course, because she does not have to care whether she finds it or not—will relaunch the comedy called "Howdy King" in Hartford tomorrow night. It may come to New York on the 29th, or it may not. This week, also, Miss Nichols will begin rehearsing the play called "Sam Ahramovitch," in which Otto Kruger will have the principal rôle.

Announcement that the Warner Brothers had taken over the Selwyn Theatre was premature: it will be a play, and not the Vitaphone, that will he installed there on Dec. 13. The Warners, however, have leased the Shubert Theatre in Newark, for the six months beginning Jan. 1, and that will leave hut a single legitimate theatre in that thriving centre.

Miss Barrymore's play, "The Constant Wife," is still due here on Nov. 29 or thereabouts. . . . "On Approval" seems to be a pleasant success at the Galety. . . . The filmed "What Price Glory?" will take over the Harris Theatre in another week, and "We Americans" will find a theatre further uptown. A week hence also "They All Want Something" is scheduled to move from Wallack's Theatre to the new Edyth Totten Theatre on Forty-eighth Street, and John Golden's "Two Girls Wanted" will be transferred from Mr. Golden's playhouse to Wallack's.

The impending London production of "The Gold Diggers" will include a number of players well known over here. Tallulah Bankhead, as already announced, will have the Ina Claire rôle; others will include Jobyna Howland, in her old part, Charles Cherry and Fred Kerr.

FURTHER SIDELIGHTS ON THE THEATRE AND ITS PEOPLE

Paris and Its Stage

PARIS.

DURING the week just ended there have been (counting the revival of "Siegfried" at the Opéra) no less than seventeen dress rehearsals; and on certain evenings, when three or four premières coincided, critics have had to be ubiquitous. Eight revivals and nine novelties have been presented, which within the space at my disposal I can review only succinctly, although six of them at least would merit extended consideration.

The Comédie Française (where the price of seats—even the parterre—has been slightly increased in order to raise the wages of the stage hands and of the petty personnel) has commemorated the hundredth anniversary of the death of the famous tragedian Talma, whose tomb, newly restored at the Père-Lachaise, has been solemnly visited by the company in a body. A remarkable one-act play, "La Leçon de Talma," written specially for this occasion by the distinguished poet René Fauchois (whose revue, "Ouvrons-le," is triumphing at "L'Oeil de Paris," and whose new piece, "Mademoiselle Jockey," is scheduled for early production at the Potinière), has been staged in a setting for which furniture and various stage properties which actually belonged to Talma have been utilised. In the foyer and the Great Gallery, M. Couet, the learned librarian of the Maison de Molière, has organised a most interesting exhibition of relics relating to Talma—autographed letters, engravings and prompt copies of plays annotated by the celebrated actor. Simultaneously, the Comédie Française has brilliantly revived the charming verse play, "Le Roi Dagobert" (created in 1908 as "Le bon Roi Dagobert"), by André Rivoire. President of the Société des Auteurs and former dramatic critic of Le Temps, who was one of the leading men in the recent international congress on the cinema. The great merit of the piece is that it deals with a subject taken from old French history, instead of Greek or Latin legend. It is admirably performed by M. M. Brunot, Croué and Siblot and by Mlles. Madeleine Renaud and Marie Bell. The delightfully archaic stage setting is by M. Charles Granval (who has just been commissioned to produce Shaw's "Great Catherine" in Monte Carlo), and incidental music has been composed by M. Raymond Charpentier. The fourth act of the play, which had been omitted on its previous revival, has now been entirely rewritten.

The brothers Isola have inaugurated their management of the redecorated, brand-new red and gold Théâtre Sarah Bernhardt with a notable revival of Sacha Guitry's irregular-verse comedy, "Deburau," which constitutes a preeminently Parisian prologue to the Anglo-Saxon operettas to be produced later on that stage. The interpretation of David Bélasco and Lionel Atwill in New York has made the play familiar to Americans. Created in Paris at the Vaudeville on Feb. 9, 1918, it was interrupted in full success by the German bombardments, so that its revival is virtually a production. A marked change has been made in the third act, the scene in which Marie Duplessis (the original of Marguerite Gautier, the "Lady with the Camellias") comes with a doctor to see her cast-off lover Deburau having been cut in its entirety, which enables Mlle. Yvonne Printemps to play Marie in the first part of the piece and Deburau's son Charles in the second. Sensuous and melancholy incidental music specially composed by the master André Messager and exquisitely warbled by Mlle. Printemps brings out the sentimental charm of this story of the Louis-Philippe period, fashioned by Sacha Guitry into a play which represents him at his best and offers considerable historical as well as autobiographical significance.

The presence of M. Emil Fabre, the Administrator of the Comédie Française, at the dress rehearsal of the Variétés, where the famous "Tripepatte," by the late Professor of Philosophy André Godfernaux and the Parisian humorist Tristan Bernard, has just been revived after twenty-one years, probably indicates that this masterly study of irresolution will soon be included in the repertory of the Maison de Molière. The superior art of André Lefaur, who succeeds Marcel Levesque in the title rôle, and the clockwork precision of the interpretation by a very strong cast deserve the warmest praise.

"Surcouf" (known as "Paul Jones" to English and American audiences), the popular operetta by Robert Planquette, the composer of "Les Cloches de Corneville" and "Rip," has been revived at the Gaieté-Lyrique. It is rather funny to hear the famous buccaneer of the Revolutionary and Napoleonic era refer to the British as "the enemy."

At the Théâtre de Paris Max Dearly's and Arquillière's inimitable "business" in the late John N. Raphael's French version of the rather stage-worn "Potash and Perlmutter" moves the audience to tempestuous laughter.

Mme. Suzanne Desprès, at the Maison de l'Oeuvre, is as admirable as ever in Gabriele d'Annunzio's "Gioconda," which is also likely to be transferred to the Comédie Française in the near future.

At the Théâtre Albert Ier the superb acting of Edward Stirling as Dr. Grimesby Rylott galvanizes the Grand-Guignolesque "thriller," "The Speckled Band," in which the cocksure deductions of Sherlock Holmes produce a mild hilarity.

Almost coincident with the death of Mlle. Jeanne Chauvin, the first French avocate, the Théâtre de l'Athénée has launched the new three-act farce comedy by Georges Berr and Louis Verneuil, "Maître Bolbec et son Mari," dealing with the conjugal and extra-conjugal experiences of a barristress. We shall have this season a number of plays on the rather dog-eared theme of women in masculine professions—notably "Maître Colas, ma femme," by Yves Mirande and Alex Madis, at the Palais-Royal (in which husband and wife are both barristers), and "La Vocation," by André Pascal (Dr. Henri de Rothschild) and Professor Delbet, at the Renaissance (dealing with lady doctors). The new product at the Berr-Verneuil collaboration (which began in 1916 with "La Charrette Anglaise" at the Gymnase and which scored again last November with two simultaneous successes, "Le Mariage de Maman" at the Théâtre Antoine and "Azaïs" at the Variétés) displays the consummate métier of the authors in a piece which combines the artificialities of vaudeville in the French sense with the far-reaching interest of a comedy of manners. It is an amusing idea to show the husband of the busy barristress obtaining an interview with his wife only by walking into her office for a legal consultation, after having offered her a double fee so that she may give him double time. Another most diverting invention is that of Rebiscoul, the idiotic client, who, misunderstanding the advices of Maître Bolbec, becomes a forger, a thief and an assassin. The play provides an opportunity to welcome the excellent stage partnership of Madeleine Soria and Lucien Rozenberg and to applaud the inimitable Arnaudy in the epic rôle of Rebiscoul.

L'Atelier has put on "La Grande Pénitence," a new five-act comedy by Léon Régis and François de Veynes, the talented young authors of the Vieux-Colombier success, "Bastos le Hardi," the subject of which is not without analogy with that of Jules Romains's "Le Dictateur." The "great penance" referred to is, of course, that announced by M. Joseph Caillaux when he was Minister of Finance, the play being a clever but unfortunately too schematic satire on the financial plight of French intellectuals. It is the story of a judge who, receiving only 600 francs a month, cannot replace his tattered robe, and of a financial expert who, although he juggles with billions on paper, cannot advance the necessary 3,000 francs. The appearance of the judge in a stolen robe restores confidence and brings prosperity to the State. Camille Corney plays the judge admirably, and Michel Duran, who bears a striking resemblance to Louis Jouvet, is very good as the financial expert. "La Grande Pénitence" is preceded by the same authors' "Chagrins d'Amour," a circus sketch in the manner of Marcel Achard. Both plays are produced in amusing settings by Kouchitachvili, a Georgian artist who formerly was with Pitoëff.

On the tiny stage of the Théâtre des Capucines (the directors of which, M. and Mme. Armand Berthez, are installing a new theatre which was already part of the adjoining sweetshop) a new operetta, "Divin Mensonge" (a title suggested by the well-known comic opera song "Fantaisie, ô divin mensonge"), has been produced with signal success. It is by Alex Madis and Pierre Veber, with "lyrics" by the poet Hugues Delorme and music by M. Joseph Szulc, the distinguished and very successful composer of "Mannequins" and "Quand on est trois." Its theme—the necessary alliance of truth and untruth in this world—is reminiscent of "Nothing But the Truth," which Pierre Veber adapted. This clever and tuneful musical comedy, which has the charm of a philosophical tale or of a medieval "morality," is exquisitely interpreted by Jean Périer of the Opéra-Comique, Marguerite Pierry and the Czechoslovak dancer, Marie Ley.

While the children of the Ecole du Spectacle (a special school for children employed in theatres, ably directed by M. Raymond Rognoni of the Comédie Française) are interpreting Molière's "Le Malade Imaginaire" at the Children's Welfare Exhibition now on at the Tuileries, Pierre Humble's delightful Théâtre du Petit Monde (Little Folks' Theatre), where the talented young comédienne, Simone Joué (now appearing in Bernstein's "Félix" at the Gymnase), made her début last season, has just resumed its Thursday afternoon performances at the Théâtre Fémina, the opening piece being "Dilloy le Chemineau," adapted by Paul Pitray from the novel by the Countesse de Ségur. It is charmingly rendered by the adult comedian Moriss in the part of the hobo and by a cast of infant prodigies, while a bear (as in "Méditerranée") dances the Carleston.

There are many new variety entertainments: "No-Noctambules" at the Noctambules; at "Chez Fursy et Mauricet," C. A. Carpentier's witty revue, "Blague—Bottom," the title of which is a sly take-off on the latest dance creation just imported from Harlem, which Harry Pilcer and his associates are also presenting at the Palace; at the Cigale, "De plus en plus chair," a revue by A. Gaillard, G. Monteux and Hornes, in a scene of which we see Clemenceau writing to Senator Borah and tearing up his letter because he realizes from reading the papers that discussions relating to money matters generally lead to crime.

MAURICE BOURGEOIS.

MORE OR LESS IN THE DRAMATIC LIMELIGHT

The Almady of the New Molnar Comedy—Mr. Titheradge and Miss Sheridan

AN English schoolboy, tall for his age and lanky, came away from a provincial schoolhouse some years ago in a state of great excitement. He had arrived at a momentous decision. He would run away from school and join the troupe of actors, a third-rate company of peregrinating players, whose productions he had just witnessed. For several performances he had sat out front entranced; now that his decision was made nothing could dissuade him. But fortunately for Reginald Owen, the schoolboy, something which may have been fate intervened in the person of an understanding master in whom he confided.

Those weren't actors, he was told; they were only strolling players—bad actors. Real acting was a mirror held up to nature, but these troupers were like the convex and concave mirrors of a side-show that reflected one's image distorted and askew; they falsified nature. Acting, a great art, required years of study and patience to master. So it happened that young Owen acquired a horror of bad acting and determined to be a real performer. With this end in view he began an ardnous period of earnest preparation.

At 16 he left school and joined Sir Herbert Tree's Academy of Dramatic Art. He applied himself so devotedly to his tasks that he won the first Bancroft medal in the annual competition for that trophy, which means that he must have been good, even in those days.

Sir Herbert gave the embryonic actor a three years' contract with his company, but after two years and a half young Owen felt that he wasn't getting sufficient experience. So he went with the Benson Players and portrayed thirty different Shakespearean characters in only six months' time. Then followed a long list of rôles, which included Mr. Darling in "Peter Pan," Von Weddel in "Old Heidelberg," Mr. Gunn in "Fanny's First Play," Lieutenant John Sayle, R. N., in "Pomander Walk," Louis Gigoux in "Oh, Oh, Delphine" and Roderick Collingwood in "A Butterfly on a Wheel." Owen served in the army from 1916 to 1919, and after the close of the war the productions which enlisted his services numbered "In the Night," "The Great Well," "Success" and "Our Betters." Owen was also co-author of a play called "Where the Rainbow Ends," which was produced in 1911.

It was in 1924 that Gilbert Miller brought him to America to appear in the Molnar play, "The Swan." He went on tour with Eva Le Gallienne and Basil Rathbone, acting the part of the Prince, which Philip Merivale had created in New York. After that he was seen in "These Charming People." Then came his performance in the Actors' Theatre revival of "The Importance of Being Earnest."

Again the combination of Molnar and Gilbert Miller came into his life. When he first read the new comedy Mr. Miller selected Owen for the rôle of Almady, the actor, in whose person Molnar has attempted to satirize all the bad actors in the world. And thus it is as Almady in "The Play's the Thing" at Henry Miller's Theatre that Reginald Owen has achieved one of the certain triumphs of his career.

The Dooleys and the Mortons.

IF YOU are an ardent follower of the vaudeville portion of the theatre, the names of Dooley and Morton will need no elaborate introduction. In brief, the subjects currently under consideration are known as Gordon Dooley and Martha Morton, and they are associated with Eddie Dowling in a musical comedy which several not particularly disinterested persons would like to have referred to as "Honeymoon Lane," and concerning which they would have it further specified that it is running quite pleasantly, thank you, at the Knickerbocker Theatre.

These two, then, are the younger, or modern, generation of the Dooley and Morton families. In the older days of variety those were names to conjure with; their presence on the billing in front of any house usually meant a capacity audience. At that time these acts were among the highest paid standard turns of show business. The Four Mortons consisted of Sam and Kitty and their children, Clara and Paul, Martha and Joe were as yet unborn. Ray and Johnny were the children in the Dooley act with their father and mother. William and Gordon were too young to appear.

A few years later when William and Gordon Dooley, envious of the success of their older brother and sister, decided to enter the profession, they got jobs in a circus and then progressed by rapid stages to a place in the family act. Finding they could make a go of it alone, they again left the rest of the Dooleys to shift for themselves and got a job in the first "Hitchy-Koo." Then they appeared at the Cocoanut Grove, which is another of the euphemistic names that the Century Roof has borne. Afterward they played in other productions and in vaudeville until William met with an accident which caused his death.

As for the rest of the family, Ray Dooley had married a young Irish boy who had appeared with her in several comedy scenes in the "Follies." He shall be nameless except that theee before-mentioned not disinterested persons certainly would not object if he were described as being the star of "Honeymoon Lane." Johnny Dooley also went his own way, with results that seem to have justified that procedure.

Martha Morton came into what must have seemed to her to be a world filled with people of that family name in Detroit in 1905. While she and the younger brother went to school, the Four Mortons continued their round of vaudeville engagements. But Sam Morton, the father, had a suspicion that both his son, Paul, and his daughter, Clara, would leave the act in the not too distant future, so he began to teach his younger offspring all he knew about tap dancing, which was considerable. He was right, for Paul Morton married Naomi Glass and they began a double act in vaudeville; Clara left to become a single performer because it meant more money. So a second edition of the Four Mortons made its début with Sam, Kitty, Joe and Martha as the members of the troupe.

Several years ago this version of the Four Mortons was headlining the bill at the Orpheum Theatre in Brooklyn. In the second feature act was none other than Gordon Dooley. He met the fair young Martha Morton; they seemed to be attracted to each other and ten days later they eloped.

This proceeding naturally upset the two families, and as a result the children were disowned. Undeterred, they went their merry way with a vaudeville act of their own, and later they were signed by George White for an edition of the "Scandals." Thus when Eddie Dowling began to cast his production — it is called "Honeymoon Lane," isn't it?—he obviated some of the difficulties of that process merely by sending for these two "in-laws" and giving them important rôles in the piece.

Janet Dexter

Rex Cherryman, Hero of "The Noose," at the Hudson.

A Playwright and an Actor.

DION TITHERADGE, who has come to New York to appear in his own play, "Loose Ends," which Sam H. Harris is presenting at the Ritz Theatre, is a member of the theatrical family of that name, a family well known in England and perhaps to a lesser degree in America. His father was George S. Titheradge, a prominent figure on the English stage for some thirty years, and his sister is Madge Titheradge, who, although meriting the description of a London favorite, is best remembered by American playgoers for her appearance here in "A Butterfly on the Wheel."

It was in a company of his father's that Dion Titheradge made his first appearance on the stage. A dramatization of "A Woman of Kronstadt" was the vehicle which brought the young man before the footlights. When, a year later, Titheradge, père, took his company to Australia, along went the son and for three years he played in the theatres of the Antipodes. His parts during that time ranged from Shakespeare to those of Blaney melodrama. Although he was a lad in his 'teens, Titheradge is said to have taken a keen delight in playing "old men" characters and he assumed such rôles even when more showy ones were available.

In mentioning his sojourn in Australia Mr. Titheradge emphasizes the fact that his greatest help in acquiring the technique of acting came from Margaret Anglin, in whose company of "The Thief" he toured Australia and New Zealand. Titheradge also appeared in that country with another American actress, Katherine Grey. Soon after his returning to England he associated himself with the Liverpool Repertory Company, for which he acted a fairly comprehensive list of parts. In 1912 he came to America for the first time as a member of the company that Lewis Waller brought here to appear in "Henry V" at Daly's Theatre. After that production was withdrawn, Titheradge remained in New York to play in the Drury Lane spectacle, "The Whip," put on at the Manhattan Opera House. Later he toured with George Arliss in "Paganini" and played with Laurette Taylor in "The Harp of Life." Sandwiched between his stage appearances there were many picture parts done at studios then in the vicinity of New York. He was with Mae Marsh in the first picture screened by the Goldwyn Company, which at the time had its headquarters at Fort Lee.

A few years later Mr. Titheradge turned to writing, directing and producing on his own account. He wrote and directed various plays and musical revues and he made the London productions of "Battling Buttler" and "Polly Preferred" among others. He was responsible for much of the material in the first, and incidentally the most successful, of the two Charlot Revues shown here.

He did not again take up acting until last Spring after he had written "Loose Ends" and found that there was no player suited for the principal part in the London production whose services were then available.

Assuming the dual rôle of author and leading player, after so long an acting retirement, seemed to him a bit too much, so he credited the "Loose Ends" to one Geoffrey Warren or to John Galsworthy or somebody, and not until the play was a success did he reveal that the writer's name was a pseudonym.

Possibly About Nancy Sheridan.

IF one has imagination one conceivably can write the biography of Nancy Sheridan, leading woman in "Sure Fire!" the Rolph Murphy play at the Comedy Theatre, without interviewing the actress. Anyway, here's a go at it:

"Born of parents who wore with pride the title of troupers, Miss Sheridan realized even at the age of 10 that her destiny was in the same field of endeavor as that of her forbears—the theatre. However, stern parental objection curbed whatever impetuous thoughts were in the mind of little Nancy. She was sent to a convent, but even in these austere, forbidding walls the rising flow of this child's histrionic ability manifested itself. Nancy whiled away many hours amusing her classmates by giving realistic imitations of the nuns in the convent. This impulsive, restless child soon tired of her cloistered life and ran away to join a stock company.

"She convinced the manager of an obscure road troupe that she had genuine dramatic ability by reciting a harrowing tale of awful tortures that would befall her if she returned to the home of a termagant stepmother. The lines she recited, incidentally, were from a scene of a play in which her mother appeared and for which little Nancy often held the prompt book.

"In this manner Nancy Sheridan made her début on the stage at the age of 10, appearing as a child of 5 in 'Eliza, the Girl With the Twinkling Eyes,' one of the barnstorming hits of those days. The following week, when the character woman was suddenly taken ill, little Nancy played her part, that of an aged crone. She gave a successful rendition of the rôle simply by imitating one of the nuns. Word soon spread of Nancy's remarkable ability.

"Mr. and Mrs. Sheridan soon heard of their daughter's progress. They visited her, watched her perform and wept tears of delight at such evidence of their child's great talents. After the performance they begged Nancy to give up the stage temporarily to go to school and then if the desire to act was still dominant to return to the theatre. So impassioned were their pleas that Nancy reluctantly consented.

"At the Dover Academy, a military school for girls, this talented child organized a dramatic club, wrote plays, composed operettas and starred in the annual school show. She displayed a talent that was marked for its versatility. Upon her graduation she resumed her stage career."

The above, patient (by now, anyway) reader, is what an imaginative person might write about Miss Sheridan, leading woman of "Sure Fire!" As a matter of fact, her parents have never been on the stage. Shortly after Miss Sheridan's graduation from the University of Washington she came to Chicago to play in a stock company. She supplemented this experience with another stock engagement, this time with a troupe in Manchester. Altogether her stage career totals a little more than a year. She was originally engaged as female understudy for "The Challenge of Youth," another Boothe, Gleason and Truex production. She filled in at rehearsals of "Sure Fire!" reading Mrs. Gleason's lines. The latter was on her way here from England at the time. When the leading feminine rôle was vacated Rollo Lloyd, the director, impressed with Miss Sheridan's performance at rehearsals, suggested to Colonel Boothe that she be given the rôle, which, as you may have guessed, was done.

Poet and Peasant

SOME surprise having been expressed in this newspaper over the fact that the author of "So This Is London!" and the adapter of "Caponsacchi" were one and the same man—to wit, Arthur Goodrich—there comes to hand a brief for that individual from Richard J. Madden of the American Play Company. Mr. Madden, who seems to be Mr. Goodrich's friend and admirer, as well as agent and most lenient critic, is indignant that astonishment should have been expressed at Mr. Goodrich's versatility—unmindful, apparently, of the fact that the surprise at Mr. Goodrich's achievement was likewise a tribute thereto.

Mr. Madden, by way of explaining Mr. Goodrich's versatility, goes at some length into the career and accomplishments of that gentleman. To wit:

"Why shouldn't Arthur Goodrich write 'So This Is London!' one year and 'Caponsacchi' the next? This is just the kind of a lad Arthur Goodrich is. His life is just one adventurous succession of doing something else again. In a narrow age of specialization he is one of the best little general practitioners I know. I've known him pretty intimately ever since he first came to New York. Here's his record—which, incidentally, he would thank me too much for exposing, for he has all too violet qualities to be useful for publicity purposes.

"On his college record he was appointed University Scholar in English at Columbia; was offered a fellowship the following year; was all set, and would say, for a university professorship. Whereupon he turned up suddenly in the editorial office of 'The World's Work,' helped to get out the first number of that magazine, was Walter H. Page's managing editor for a number of years and held other editorial positions. He was all slated to be a magazine editor for life, and a successful one, too, when out of a clear sky he gets on a boat, loafs around Europe for a couple of years freelancing and comes home with plenty of money in his pockets and with the manuscript of a novel. That novel, 'The Balance of Power,' became one of the best sellers of its time. It was a story with a background of business and politics. Everybody, including his publishers, expected he would follow it up with another of the same general sort. Did he? He did not. His next was a poetic, glamourous bit of melodrama of the North Woods. And his next a tale of European intrigue. And so on through half a dozen or more, always trying something different, never writing the same thing twice because that was the obvious, practical thing to write.

"Meanwhile, by way of variety, Goodrich has been, on the side, a soloist in different leading New York churches and has done a quantity of concert and oratorio singing. He even was tempted toward the stage. He was offered the part of Robin Hood in a road company of 'The Pinafore.' And then—here's the most amusing twist—a manufacturing concern was put on his shoulders as a matter of duty. He ran that business for eight years with one hand, while he wrote more novels with the other, built the business up to success and sold it. He came quietly back to New York, and the first thing his friends knew his first play, 'Yes or No,' was announced. It promptly defied tradition and ran a season in New York, but before the run was over Goodrich was in the army. He was a Captain on the General Staff when he was finally discharged. Then came 'So This Is London!' 'The Joker,' a new comedy which the Pacific Coast liked last Winter and which New York has yet to see, and now this really monumental dramatic version of 'The Ring and the Book,' called 'Caponsacchi.'

"'Caponsacchi' isn't the first verse he has written—not by a long shot. He has written and published, in other years, a quantity of short stuff and he has been a confirmed Browning fan ever since he was a kid. He has written some interesting and melodic music, too. Also, Goodrich has the amusing idea that some day he will try, for fun, writing a musical comedy, doing the music as well as the book. He may not, but I wouldn't put it by him. Nothing he may do will surprise me any more. And just one more thing, he knows more about investments than almost any man I've met who isn't in the investment business. Not because he has such a lot of money. Just because the darn thing interests him.

"He is a member of the Century Club, one of the governing board of The Players and a trustee of his college, Wesleyan. He is a brother-in-law of Walter Hampden, though only a comparatively few intimates know it. Neither of these ever mentions it. Probably they're both ashamed of it. He is one of the poorest and one of the luckiest Kelly pool players in the world, and at golf he is positively humanitarian. He will almost always miss a putt when I want him to.

"I haven't any idea what he will do next. He may run for Congress or swim the Channel or write an Icelandic saga in troubadour French. But whatever it is, I'll wager he gets away with it. In a period of grooves and dead wood he may be considered a rolling stone, but, take it from me, this bird gathers moss."

STAGE MATTERS—AN AMERICAN COMPOSER—LONDON NEWS

Elizabeth Risdon in Arthur Richman's "A Proud Woman," Opening at Maxine Elliott's Tomorrow.

MR. SHAW DISCUSSES PLAYHOUSES

indeed inherent in drama at its highest concentration, but they were originally only products of the mechanical conditions of the ancient Greek theatre, and to impose these conditions, or, still worse, the conditions of the scenic theatres of the seventeenth-ninsteenth centuries on all playwrights is to deprive the theatre of the services of many most entertaining novelists and fabulists of one kind or another, and to put a premium on the mental defects of playwrights who have what is called a sense of the theatre, which usually means that they have lost all sense of anything in nature but the stage.

No theatre is likely to be generally useful in the future unless its stage is so constructed that it can present a play in fifty scenes without a break. I do not mean that there should be no break, as fifty scenes might be too much for the endurance of the audience; but I do mean that the suspension of the performance for ten minutes or so should be solely for the relief of the spectators, and not a mechanical necessity. If I am right, most of our existing theatres will become unlettable as playhouses. I hope they will; the sooner the better.

My next play will be a chronicle play which will be impracticable without a Shakespearean stage. I do not know whether it will be in fifty scenes or fifteen or five hundred, but in writing it I shall ignore the limitations of the nineteenth century scenic stage as completely as Shakespeare did. I shall have to depend on the Theatre Guild of America for a performance of it, just as I had to depend on it for a performance of "Back to Methuselah." But I want the Guild to build a new theatre for it, and I should hesitate to ask them to do so if I did not believe that the sort of theatre my next play needs will soon be the only sort easily salable or lettable for popular theatrical purposes. The specification is simple enough. The auditorium must combine the optics and acoustics of a first-rate tecture theatre and a first-rate circue. There must be a fore-stage extending on occasion to the occupation of all the floor level (what is called the ring in an equestrian circus), and the backstage must be easily curtained off and provided with modern machinery capable of doing its work noiselessly whilst the play is proceeding on the fore-stage. That the stage lighting should be modern, and if possible planned by persons who have never seen footlights, and wonder what on earth they can have been when they read about them in books, goes without saying. Lee Simonson knows all about that.

The general effect during a performance should be the reverse of the nineteenth century effect. In it the important epectacie was the evening dress and diamonds of the members of the acting manager's free list, occupying the stalls and boxes to the exclusion of the outsiders who get into a theatre by paying (a thing any nobody can do), the stage being a mere hole in the wall at the narrow end, through which you peeped at a remote tableau vivant resembling a pictorial advertisement of the best rooms in the latest hotel. In the new theatre of the Guild, the audience must pay and not be seen, as good children should be seen and not heard; and it should be impossible for a person entering during a performance to have eyes for anything but the all-dominating stage. The stage must be in general conception a trihune, and not a ridiculous peepshow with painted canvas profiles pretending to be natural scenery.

Let me, however, warn all the vulgar theatre builders and planners—meaning mostly those who consider the Theatre Guild an asylum for freaks and cranks—that though they may possibly find many authors able to write effectively for this new old sort of theatre who cannot write for the theatre of Scribe and Sardon at all, they must not imagine, as so many film companies have done, that playing about with the latest lighting systems and ehowing what hydraulic lifts and electric turntables can do will interest any audience for more than the first half minute. The old formula of two trestlee, four boards and a passion etill hoids, and will hold until we grow out of playgoing altogether, provided the passion be passionate enough; for the best in this sort are but ehadows, and the worst no worse if imagination mend them, as Shakespeare found.

My own practice varies, as far as the mechanical conditions allow me, from the ultra-classic to the ultra-operatic. In certain plays of mine I have voluntarily accepted the strictest unity of time and place for a three hours' action, as if I were Sophocles; in others I have thrown the unities to the winds, and not only presented my play in three or five acts but divided those acts into scenes. But that does not concern the spectators, who neither know nor care how I do it: it is the what, not the how, that they look to. Still, though the mechanical conditions count for nothing with them (for they see a play as in a dream and are only awekened and annoyed by having the physical conditione of the uncomfortable place they are packed into thrust on their notice), none the less the playwright and the actors must work eubject to those physical conditions and know how to turn them to account. The novelist, who writes in a dream almoet as completely as the playgoer eees the stage in one, often cannot write an actable play for this reason. If I were to forget the physical conditione of the theatre and the physical reality of the actor for a moment, my plays would become partly ineffective, partly tmpossible. Thus I am tied down to what can actuaiiy be done with the theatre as tt stands, and tf you perform my plays in any sort of theatre hut the one they were written for, you may have to mutilate them more or less horribly to make them practicable. That is what happened to Shakespeare when the Elizabethan etage was supplanted by the operatic scenic peepshow stage. The Shakespearicidal result of that proves that when you have to choose between mutilating the play and rebuilding the theatre you had better rebuild the theatre.

Also, tt is evident that if the Theatrs Guild can give me another sort of theatre I can write another sort of play, quite as good as and fresher in form than the old ones, but impossible of performance in the old nineteenth century theatres. Wagner, after composing operas for the old opera houses, composed the Ring for a theatre that did not exist, and thereby forced it into existence. But his Baireuth theatre would he of no use to me for my chronicle play, which I am writing for a theatre that does not yet exist in New York, hut which the Theatre Guild will have to design and huild for the purpose. Whether my play will have the compelling force of the Ring I do not know; but at least if my New York congregation will not provide the Guild with funds for the theatre the play shall be there to tantalize them; and they may find themselves in the almost inconceivably retrograde pcsition of being behind London after leaving London nowhere by tempting the Guild to produce "Back to Methuseiah," an exploit, still unique, which so amazed me that I have hardiy yet recovered my hreath after it.

THE ASCENDANT GERSHWIN

Being the Story of His Rise From Piano Player to Carnegie Hall

ANOTHER young man, born as was Jed Harris, "circa 1900," who has come to occupy a definite place in the New York theatre—in the musical comedy portion of the New York theatre, at any rate—is George Gershwin, the 28-year-old composer and just now the elect and annointed of the local ecore-fashioners. Not only that, hut Mr. Gershwin is the only denizen of those eide streets in the Forties known collectively as Tin Pan Alley, who has bridged the gap that seems to lie between the hammerings of the Timee Square melody foundriee and the more classic dissonances of Carnegie and Aeolian Halie, an accomplishment which, as all the world must know, was hrought about by his "Rhapeody in Blue" and last eeason's Concerto in F.

Still another Brooklyn boy who has made good, Mr. Gershwin was born in that borough on Sept. 26, 1898—the year which, unless the always accurate reference works are guiity of tremendous inaccuracy, found the transpontine municipality being taken into the Greater City. Nobody before him of all the Gershwins had ever played a musical instrument—even in Brooklyn—and Euterpe was certainly, even at the risk of mixing a possible metaphor, not among their Lares and Penates.

At an early age the boy moved with his family to the lower east side—to Grand Street, to be epecific—and there he enjoyed an untroubled childhood without thoughts of music once entering his head. He spent his days and part of hie nights participating in the eports indigenous to Grand Street youthe and never did he have any desire to harmonize. In fact he rather looked down on the boye in the neighborhood who were forced by doting parents to spend an interval every day practicing away at the piano or the violin.

It was not until he was 12 that any interest in things musical became a part of his life. By that time his family had moved to Second Avenue and Seventh Street, and, possibly in honor of the event, his mother purchased a piano. Young George, of all the Gershwin ehildren, was fascinated hy the instrument. He began to pcck away at it and to attempt to improvise until his father found more peace and quiet amid the clatter of dishes in his restaurant than in his evenings at home. To remedy this nnhappy eituation, a young woman ptano teacher was hired for the sum of 50 cents an hour and much to his surprise Master Gershwin began to run over his scales and such exercisee as "The Jolly Farmer," not only willingly hut even with a certain eagerness.

So conscientiously, in fact, did he go about this business of learning to play the piano that when, after four or five months of study, he was taken on visits to former friends and neighbors tn Grand Street and induced to give exhibitione of his newly acquired ability, these voinbly astonished good folk credited the boy and hie parents with having held out on them. They said that he must have been studying surreptitiously and under cover for at least two years.

When he was graduated from grammar schooi, Master Gershwin enrolled in the High School of Commerce, where, perforce, he had to epend most of his time attending business courses, which may have been fortunate for his music, as he had no interest in his curricular activities and left before graduation.

Irving Berlin and Jerome Kern and not Christy Mathewson and Jim Thorpe were his idols hy thie time, and any pursuit of them necessarily led him uptown where they were enthroned. So to Remick's he went in search of a job as piano player and it was given him along with a weekly remuneration of $15. He had by then attained the age of 16 or 17.

It was in those days that he started to compose, and he kept at it intermittently during his two and a half years at Remick's. He left that concern when, even taking Paderewski into consideration, he felt that he couldn't get very far as a piano player. Then he drifted into his first active contact with the theater. Thie was a job rehearsing "Miss 1917," which Victor Herbert and Jerome Kern wrote. So capably did he perform at the piano for the chorus drille and ensemhle rehearsals that Ned Wayburn kept him on the payroll after the opening, and among other duties assigned him to earn hie weekiy etipend of $35 wae the task of playing for the Sunday night concerts which were a part of "Miss 1917's" brief run at the Century Theatre. It was at one of these that eome of his compositione had their first public hearing, for Vivienne Segal sang numbers called "You—Jnst You" and "There's More to a Kiss," the latter of which was included in the first musical play for which he provided the score—"La, La, Lucille." Just before the close of "Miss 1917" an exeeutive of Harms had heen tnformed of the promising youngster who was around the Century Theatre, and after the demise of the piece Gershwin was summoned to that music publishing housc, where he was offered a contract as one of its compoeers. This happened within eix or eight months after he had left Remick's. One of the numbers he wrote while at Harms's was "I Was So Young, You Were So Beautiful."

When he was 20 Gershwin was commissioned to do the music for "La, La, Lucille" by Alex A. Aarons. After he had performed this service the paths of the equally young producer and composer separated and it was not until "Lady, Be Good," some eeven years later, that they were united.

About this time George White had emerged from vandeville and, in one way or another, got together enough cash and assembled enough people who would trust him to put on the first of his annual entertainments, the "Scandals of 1919." The late Arthur Jackson, who wrote the lyrics for "La, La Lucille," had prepared one of George White's vaudeville acts. Through Jackson Gershwin was introduced to the oncoming Mr. White, with the reeult that when the second "Scandals" was in preparation the young composer was obtained to do the music. In all he performed this service for five editions of the "Scandals"—thoee of 1020, 1921, 1922, 1923 and 1924.

However, not all his efforts were directed toward turning out fresh, ingenious and exciting melodies for those revues, for he wrote the music for several other ehowe and a number of interpolated songs—among the latter "Do It Again," "Yankee Doodle Blues" end "I Won't Say I Will."

The productions which credited George Gershwin with their musie during this period were "Dangerous Maid," which never got to New York; "Our Nell," in which Emma Haig was seen for a time at the Nora Bayes Theatre, and an English piece, "Primrose."

In "Dangerous Maid" there was an actor called Vinton Freedley—he etill ie called that, if you're going to be captious, but he is no longer an actor. He is now, tn fact, the partner of Alex A. Aarons in the sponsorship of various later Gershwin musicals—first, "Lady, Be Good," then "Tip-Toee," and now Gertrude Lawrence's ehow, "Oh, Kay!" which came last week to the Imperial.

Any more than passing mention of George Gershwin's career must bring in some reference to brother Ira, who has written the lyrics for the entertainments beginning with "Lady, Be Good" and is hy way of being the composer's best collaborator and severest critic as well as an excellent tyricist on his own account. It was George Gershwin who suggested that hie brother take up this business after he was graduated from college. Ira Gershwin's first chance in New York came when he did the lyrics for the musical entertainment called "Two Littie Girls in Blue" under the name of Arthur Francis—a pseudonym compounded from the given names of a brother and a sister. The before menttoned "Dangerous Maid" was the first show on which the Gershwins worked together.

A list of soms of Mr. Gershwin's best known compositions may not be amiss at thie point—not only for purposes of cataloguing but also for purposes of remembrance. These include "Scandal Walk," "South Sea Isles," "Drifting Along With the Tide," "I'll Build a Stairway to Paradiee," "Where Ie the Man of My Dreams?" and "Somebody Loves Me," all from the "Scandals"; "Swanee," "Fascinatin' Rhythm," "Sweet and Low Down," "Lady, Be Good," "That Certain Feeling," "135th Street," which Paul Whiteman did last season and, of course, the "Rhapsody in Blue" and the Concerto. Besides the Aarone and Freedley showe he has, among more recent endeavors, written "Tell Me More" and collaborated on "Song of the Flame."

Such, then, is an outline of George Gershwin's history—at least up to the premiere of "Oh, Kay!" last Monday. He has other productions in prospect for this season—one called "Strike Up the Band," which he ie doing for Edgar Selwyn, and a musical version of "East Is Weet."

Next season, so he saye, he is definitely going in for more serious work. Next season, as time ts reckoned in the theatre, is a long way off, and if that etatement is true it is possible that articles about him will belong more properly in the music departments of all well-regulated newspapers. But no matter how ecrious he becomes, it seems a certainty in a world brimful of uncertainties that the season after this will not be enttrely bereft of a musical entertainment boasting one of hie scores. In fact, any one wishing to place money to the contrary will be given a hearty reception in thie particular niche of THE TIMES.

VAUDEVILLE GOSSIP

THIS will be Eddie Leonard week at the Palace, as any one in the vicinity of Seventh Avenue and Forty-seventh Street who can read will doubtless discover sooner or later. The popular minstrel will have a company of some twenty persons to assist him in his dancing and vocal specialties, and there are rumors about that, tf properly urged, he may even be indueed to eing "Roly Boly Eyes."

Another not uncelebrated entertainer—on the twenty-four sheet stands of the town, at least—who will contribute her eervices to the Palace program for the next eeven days will he Trini, the Spanish dancer. She evidently comes fired with ambttion, for it is said that in the course of her act she will challenge Raquel Meller'e eupremacy as a dramatic singer.

The vaudeville program at the Hippodrome will be headed by Mme. Donatella'e "Carnival of Venice" act and will further include Tom Smith, Meyer Golden'a Royal Court Symphony—whatever it may be—Harris and Holley, the Four Diamonds and that old stand-by, Alf. W. Loyal'e Dogs.

Jane Cowl is scheduled to open in vaudeville tomorrow in Chicago. She will be seen tn a one-act playiet, having to do, it is said, with the Gerald Chapman case. After that appearance she will come East for engagements at the Palace and E. F. Albee Theatres.

THE THEATRE IN ENGLAND

Sighing for Drama of Ideas—"Habit" and Other New Productions

LONDON.

LIKE other craftsmen, a critic likes to he provided with the materials of his craft, and hie principal material is not eimply the drama, but the drama of ideas. If the drama of ideas flourishes he is happy, for then, if he has an intellect, he may freely exereise it. Hie periods of distress, of difficulty, of embarrassment, are those in which the stage ls used as an opportunity, not for original thought or genuinely creative etory-telling, but for theatrical contrivance. Without going to the extremes of theatricalism, let me take two playe of Pinero'e to potnt my contrast—"Iris" and "Letty." One is a play of ideas; the other is no more than an ingenious etory. One you may discuss forever without weariness, for to discuss it is inevitably to search deeply in the nature of woman; the other restricts your discussion to a survey of Pinero's craftsmanship—an interesting subject, but a limited one. One, according to the standards of the period in which it was written, is a criticism of life; the other, except superficially, is not.

At the moment the London stage appears to have ceased altogether to criticize life. It is full of etortes of the kind that one reads in a magazine during a railway journey when one has forgotten to bring a book. The last playe I have seen may serve as examples. The first, "Hahlt," by Raiph Stock, is being given at the Q Theatre by a small but distinguished cast of five—Norman McKinnel, Lawrence Hawray, Louise Hampton, Gillian Lind and Tom Nesbitt. Their names, to one who remembers their other work, particularly Norman McKinnel's and Louise Hampton's, suggest that the play tn which they appear may be one of subtlety and originality—a comment, perhaps, in dramatic form on the influence that the speed and pressure of contemporary life have upon the formation of habits, upon their nature and upon their permanence. (I make thts suggestion only tn order to give an example of one of the thousand pregnant ideas from which the author of a play called "Habit" might have chosen.) But what Ralph Stock has chosen to say is that certain men are stubborn and tenacious. His work, if you search it for ideas, yields nothing more illuminating than that. To which, I euppose, the reply is that you are not intended to eearch tt for ideas, but to enjoy it as a story—the story of an old seaman living ashore who was ao determined that every pot and pan should hang tn its right place, every meal be served at its right time and everything be precisely ehip-shape, that he drove first one wife and then another to leave him and came near to murdering his daughter's lover for no worse crime than that he was a casual, untidy Irishman. Thie etory, such as it is, is well told and the character drawing, though monotonous, is firm and clear. The actors do all they can to lend depth by their interpretation. But more than that what on earth is a critic to say? The play criticizes nothing and so leaves ue with nothing to criticize.

A second play, "The Lash," by Cyril Campion at the Royalty, falls in the same way. It tells of a determined, good-natured, forbearing father who ie confronted with the task of curing the dissipation and extravagance of his son. Hie method is to pack the boy off to Australia and, when that has failed, to seek him out in the room of his mistress and flog him mercilessly. The result, if you please, is an inetant and complete change in the boy'a character. This is, on the surface, so improbable, so contrary to normal experience, that I was tempted for a moment into supposing that the dramatist had an "idea" about it. Perhaps he was going to show us why those who believe that flogging is psychologically ineffective except as a temporary deterrent are, in his opinion, wrong. Perhaps, alternatively, he was going to show ue in his third act that flogging produces highly unexpected results both in those who administer and those who suffer it. But, no. The third act does not yield an idea or an attempted explanation of any kind. The bad boy has become a good boy; the cad a gentleman; the betrayer of girls a repentant and devoted husband. And all because his father flogged him. This is to ridiculously blatant that we are forced to suppose once more that the interest of the play is in its story, not its thought. If this is so, we are forced to a further conclusion yet more unpleasant—that the flogging scene is intended to be attractive for the flogging's sake. Certainly there are playgoers with a taste for violence of this kind, but it leaves the critic in despair.

Of course the remedy is to run away to the Chelsea Palace, where there is a repertory season of Shaw's old plays, or to the Old Vic, where is "Henry V" (if you happen to enjoy this as an example of Shakespeare), or to the Kingsway, where Edith Evans is giving a beautiful performance in Ibsen's "Rosmersholm," or to Barnes, where Tchekhov'e "Three Sisters" has been revived. The London theatre is by no meane without its pleasures and it is rich in encouragement to students of the art of acting. But Shaw, Shakespeare, Ibsen and Tchekhov do not help one toward discovery of a young English drama of ideas. Nor does a revival at the Playhouse of Sheldon'a "Romance" with Doris Keane as the opera singer and Orlo Nares as the clergyman. This is intellectually an empty play, but it is too decorative to be unpleasant. I enjoyed it even at its most absurd, and there is no denying that, in the old tradition of sugared melodrama, it is theatrically effective. Miss Keane was very warmly welcomed; but so was her monkey, Adelina. That was the good-humored mood of the evening. Under the influence of crinolines and soft music we had ceased to trouble our heads about the drama of ideas.

FROM THE DRAMATIC MAIL BAG

Mr. Kelly and "Daisy Mayme."

To the Dramatic Editor:

May I take issue with you on some of your comments on "Daisy Mayme," printed in last Sunday's paper?

To begin with, don't you think that you are somewhat hard on Daisy? She has one highly commendable trait which you seem to have overlooked. She is independent. Whether hy making the flapper's dresses, by doing housework, or by tnsisting upon paying for the taffy, she will contribute her share of the party every time. It is this virtue, contrasted with the desire for dependence exhihited by every other woman character in the play which givea this comedy its theme. Because she possesses this trait, although her blatant laugh and her overconfident stride may, as time goes on, prove to be irritating mannerisms, she will never degenerate into another "Craig's Wife." Vulgar mannered she may be, but never vulgar minded, and (Mr. George Jean Nathan please note) ehe never emits a eingle wise-crack, although a playwright of less talent than Mr. Kelly would surely have conceived her to be of the wise-cracking variety. I desire to go on record as one of those "unprejudiced observers" who regarded Daisy Mayme as a real rescuer and rejoiced naively in her triumph.

Instead of being the "dusky mouse" which you have characterized it, I believe that "Daisy Mayme" has genuine significance. It reveals for our inspection and amusement faults and foibles which are so common as to be almoet universal. Mr. Kelly has not, as you said, indicated his characters because he understands them thoroughly. On the contrary, because of the depth of his understanding he has refrained from encumbering his slender plot with any expression of his personal sympathy or disapproval. Ho eeems to have reached the conclusion that people are as they are, and enjoy being that way, and he isn't trying to do anything about it. He presents his characters accurately, and you are quite welcome to like or dislike them, as you please. This may be what you refer to when you say that you miss interpretation, &c. While I do not underrate the value of the more subjective forms of dramatic writing, I believe that his completely objective point of view carried out by his "representational method of craftsmanship," is the supreme mark of Mr. Kelly's particular talent. And nowhere has he carried it to finer perfection than in "Daisy Mayme."

David Vardi and the Habima.

To the Dramatic Editor:

Recently many articles have appeared, in your paper and elsewhere, relative to the work of the Habima. The romance of that organization cannot be overestressed, hut one wonders where the name of David Vardi is in these réeumés of that theatre's history.

It eeems strange that Vachtangov, genius though he was, should be given sole credit for such works as "The Dybhuk" and "The Eternal Jew." More than once it has been related how "out of Hebrew lore, Hebrew language, Hebrew art and Hebrew music" he wove a magic tale. Vachtangov was a Ruesian and not only knew nothing of the Hehrew language, but made no pretense of acquaintance with Jewish (and especially Chassidie) types.

Vardi is a Hehrew scholar—it was he who furnished the types for the two aforementioned playe. The direction is largely his, and it wae Vachtangov himself who said: "Without Vardi there would have been no 'Dybbuk.'"

Then the music. All the chants of "The Dybbuk" and "The Eternal Jew" are Vardi's own copyrighted compositions—yet even these are not credited to him in the current notices. The Lamentation, the high point of "The Eternal Jew," is his own theme.

The work of David Vardi and Eva Yoalit in their studio at 21 East Forty-ninti. Street is hampered by the abeolute neglect of them in the stories of the Habima now appearing in connection with the forthcoming appearance of that group.

NEW PLAYS OPENING IN THE PROVINCES

ETHEL BARRYMORE and her new Maugham comedy, "The Constant Wife," have been visiting the Middle West—Cleveland and Detroit, to be exact. In Cleveland the play seems to have been launched with inadequate preparation and criticism on that score was general. The news from Detroit, however, is more cheering. Len G. Shaw, writing in The Free Press, gives this account of the piece:

"In this instance Mr. Maugham has not contented himself with the human triangle which has been the principal stock in trade of so many dramatists from the day when Sophocles added a third actor to the brace of principals introduced by Aeschylus as a relief to the Greek chorus. He has squared the circle by bringing in a fourth character, thereby giving an unusual twist to the narrative.

"A wife, who after fifteen years of wifely living can no longer conceal the unfaithfulness of her husband that has scandalized her family and friends, admits that her love for him has long been dead. There is no scene on the part of this easy-going woman who faces the world with a laugh that does not always ring true, in spite of her efforts to appear unconcerned. Instead, she shields the interloper, sends a justly jealous man off with his wife to the far parts of the earth; embalms her erring mate in a manner more effective than all the gems she might heap on him, and when he is properly repentant she sets off with an old flame for a tour of Italy. It is one of those nonchalant love-takings on her part that works out better back of the proscenium than it would in real life, we fancy. She will be back presently, she intends the one for whom her affection has curdled. And he, dazed, distressed by this turn of affairs, promises to take her back when the novelty of the adventure in which she is about to engage has dulled.

"Into this warp Mr. Maugham has woven lines that crackle. Few playwrights of the present are capable of putting into the mouths of their characters the wisely philosophic observations that seem to come so easily from the caustic pen of this dramatist, who belies the assertion that Englishmen lack a sense of humor. True, many of these thrusts are devastating in their force, but they are turned so deftly that they provoke more than chuckles. And if there appears at times a tendency to become overly epigrammatic, it is easily forgiven because of the contrast it affords to the commonplaces with which so many plays of the period are punctured. It is sophisticated comedy in which maximum results are obtained with a none too generous supply of material; evenly written, spiced with wit and told in a manner that holds interest even in the least plausible moments. For it is a bit difficult to visualize so placid a female as the heroine of this table, who under the greatest provocation remained unruffled, or a woman quite so stupid as the one who caused the break-up.

"This, however, has nothing to do with a performance that was flawless, and that, first of all, brought Miss Barrymore back, more radiant than we have seen her in many years, and acting with the finesse that has always distinguished her finest achievements, playing with a subtlety and a finish that makes her Constance Middleton quite believable. Blithely she faces the tragedy which settles over the home where outwardly there is naught but happiness, and the manner in which she handles the delicate situations devised by the author is nothing short of a triumph."

MRS. INSULL'S Chicago venture might appear to be purely local, but one may rest assured that any promising plays will eventually be presented in New York. She began her Chicago season recently with a play by Gretchen Damrosch Finletter, daughter of Walter Damrosch, called "The Runaway Road," and the Chicago newspapers considered it good. It was thus described in The Daily News:

"Mrs. Finletter's play deals with New England life contrasted with that of Continental Europe. She has taken a simple fact of history and given it a clever twist which makes her comedy original, simple and natural. Her treatment of a situation in the household of the Maine Titcombs is direct and ingenious. Her characters stand on their own feet—types, to be sure, but not overdrawn.

"The rôle Mrs. Insull plays is that of a farmer's wife. She had taught school before her marriage and was full of romance, poetry and a love for the beautiful. After winning her the stalwart New Englander, who had praised her wavy hair and pretty ways, had ceased to notice them and had gone in for politics and a flirtation with his assistant campaign manager. Feeling that there must be something for her besides the dull routine of the wintry hillsides, the neglected wife summons her loyal Harriet, the 'help' of the farm house, gayly bids adieu to her home, first pinning the inevitable note on the inevitable pincushion, as she says she has always longed to do, and sets forth on the 'runaway road.' It leads to Paris. Further, it leads to the loge of the hotel at Etrecamp and a debonair young French Lieutenant. 'Mme. Titcomb' is a nobody from America until she gives the Lieutenant a confidence. She tells him that a President of the United States has passed the night in her farm house. There is a tablet to say that George Washington has slept in one of the beds—the bed which is now hers. Her simple statement is misinterpreted. Immediately she becomes a figure of romance. She is courted, the hotel becomes a mecca for curiosity seekers. She is regarded as a great personage, none other than the favorite, the good friend of a great ruler. When Harriet, the companion, realizes what has happened, her dismay knows no bounds. To 'Mme. Titcomb' the idea is horrible but nice. The infatuated Lieutenant follows her to America. He avowed love for her arouses the New England husband to an appreciation of his wife's charms and so the year rolls round on the New England hillsides and happiness comes."

THE LONDON STAGE

Special Cable to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

LONDON, Nov. 10.—Of the three openings of the week, "Courage," "Half a Loaf" and "Yellow Sands," the last named, by the Phillpotts (father and daughter), seems to be the most popular. "Yellow Sands" is a play of English rural life which promises to rival the popularity of "The Farmer's Wife."

William Gaunt, the Shuberts' associate here, has obtained the English rights to "Broadway." . . . The next American musical attraction to open here will be "Happy Go Lucky."

What seemed to be an extraordinary farewell was given by the admirers of "The Fall Guy" and Ernest Truex on the last night of the play's engagement. The audience applauded so long that Mr. Truex was forced to make a speech, explaining his bewilderment that a play which people liked so much should be a failure. It is understood that Mr. Truex will play the Frank Craven rôle in "The First Year," which Winchell Smith is rewriting for London presentation.

Arnold Bennett's successful novel, "Riceyman Steps," has been adapted for the stage by Michael Morton and will shortly be shown here for matinee performances.

O'Neill's "All God's Chillun Got Wings" opened this week at the Gate Theatre. The critics described it as "a strange and pitiful tragedy."

REFRESHING GENTLE FUN

"Everybody's Acting" a Nice Contrast to Riotous "Navy" Comedy

By MORDAUNT HALL.

AFTER a barrage of so-called humor it is a relief to view a picture that possesses the sanity of "Everybody's Acting," an effort written and directed by Marshall Neilan. It has genuine fun put on entertainingly, and even Ford Sterling, who is often addicted to overpantomiming, in this sketch gives a relatively restrained demonstration of a bachelor who, with three other men, father a stage orphan from the time she is an infant. They are known as the Association of Fathers, and perhaps the most amusing character in this picture is where they undertake to cooperate in defeating the purpose of one Anastasia Potter, a business woman who does not smile upon the idea of her son, Ted, marrying the attractive stage waif.

It is in this chapter to which the title refers, for Anastasia, a woman who is constantly surrounded by telephones, decides to call upon Doris Poole and her Association of Fathers, to bring to Ted's attention the undesirability of the match. Michael Poole (Mr. Sterling) and Doris's other guardians, think up a way to surprise the adamant Anastasia. Their dwelling is none too pretentious and so to give it an atmosphere of luxury they borrow the stage scenery and also the costumes. They believe that a butler will make an impression upon the snobbish Anastasia, and therefore one of the guardians consents to impersonate a butler. His stage characterizations have run to such servants and therefore he is able to make the most of the part before Anastasia and others Raymond Hitchcock officiates as the butler, and in his clawhammer coat and striped trousers, it can be said, without any reflection on Mr. Hitchcock, that he brings to bear an atmosphere of affluence to the household.

Mr. Poole dresses in his best stage clothes, not forgetting his spats, and Clayton Budd (Stuart Holmes) also lends a decorative touch to the group. An elderly actress, summoned from her washboard, officiates as a dowager. Hence Anastasia, played by Louise Dresser, is not a little astonished when she drops in upon the girl her son loves and is received by a somewhat bored butler. The furnishings of the rooms, together with the bearing of the well-dressed men and women, rather frustrate her evil intentions.

Mr. Neilan introduces some bright ideas when the busy stage people are transforming the drab-looking room into one which at least bears a resemblance of good taste and comfort. The feet of the stagehands are shown willingly carrying out the properties from the theatre and arranging them in the apartment. The fixtures are assembled, and just before the work has been finished the director gives a flash of screwdrivers, a gimlet and various other tools, followed by a glimpse of a clock to remind one of the passing time.

Betty Bronson, who made her important screen début in the film version of Sir James M. Barrie's "Peter Pan," tackles the rôle of the stage orphan, Doris, and, except in those scenes in which she is asked to become highly emotional, she does very well. Mr. Neilan ought to have been content to permit her to act within the limitations of her own temperament. Another worthy performance is that of Miss Dresser, who always succeeds in giving a rôle the real spirit of the character.

Raymond Hitchcock is never at a loss in delivering his conception of sensible comedy. He has an easy manner before the camera and is informative in his gestures and expressions without unnecessary emphasis. He gives the audience credit for some intelligence.

Beatrice Lillie's Film.

BEATRICE LILLIE, the clever English comedienne of Charlot's Revue, appeared in a picture called "Exit Smilin'," which was on exhibition at Loew's State. This production, one incidentally written by Marc Connelly, was directed by Sam Taylor, who filmed many of Harold Lloyd's comedies. After seeing this film one has to conclude that Mr. Taylor and Mr. Connelly do not make a good combination. Miss Lillie, however, comes nearer to being a female Charlie Chaplin than any screen actress. She has her usual stage mannerisms, which are well suited to a certain style of pictures, but unfortunately throughout "Exit Smilin'" the scenes have received insufficient study. This picture is no masterpiece. In fact the producers had such little faith in it that they would not present it at the Capitol. However, due to Miss Lillie's work, it is more amusing than those waterlogged contraptions masquerading as comedies. Jack Pickford, as the hero in "Exit Smilin'," contributes to the screen nothing better than Mr. Taylor's direction. It looks as though Mr. Connelly's bright idea had been crushed under the steam roller of standardized fun.

Pagan Louts.

WALLACE BEERY and Raymond Hatton, the team that was eminently successful in a picture called "Behind the Front," are to be seen at the Rialto in "We're in the Navy Now." The exploits of this pair result in a farce in which the characters are not only obstreperous but hardly up to scratch mentally. They act and think with all the sagacity of overgrown babes, and this, be it known, aroused no little laughter in the theatre, especially in those sections that might be called the gallery. At the same time there were a number of persons who could sit through this elephantine comedy without cracking a smile.

The first big laugh is caused by Mr. Beery, as a pugilist, being knocked out with one blow by a man who means business.

Then we have:

Beery, in a boat with other sailors, happens to observe that there is water in the craft. He and Hatton pull out the hung and let in the Atlantic Ocean.

By some extraordinary fashion Beery carries a knife with which he manages to slash all the rungs of a pilot's ladder, so that when the Admiral leaves a platform he makes a precipitous plunge into the water.

Beery and Hatton spend several moments attacking a hammock as if it were a wild animal.

Through the use of alum in mistake for sugar, their lips are puckered, and a French or Portuguese Admiral (it does not really matter) is wroth because he thinks that they are mimicking his pursed lips.

This combination, as seamen, lock the Captain in the refrigerating room, which happens to be conveniently near for the carrying out of this bit of comedy.

Wallace Beery never pretended that he was a comedian, and while he is a clever actor, who perhaps gave one of his outstanding performances as the Professor in "The Lost World," he is not a handyman with fun. In this witless gem, Mr. Beery is permitted to be a sailor who does not know how to tie the tape on his underclothes. One can excuse his stretching himself out in the Captain's cabin, and also the idea of his putting on the Captain's cap, but there are other sequences in which Mr. Beery can't hear, see or feel. He can taste and we presume that he can smell. He and Hatton never get the chance to explain that they did not wish to enlist in the navy, which is pardonable if funny. In fact one can forgive the most impossible bits of business so long as they have a true proportion of humor. There are possibilities for a wealth of real comedy aboard a battleship, and some of the incidents that actually happen in the navy are infinitely more comic than any of the forced attempts in "We're in the Navy Now."

Mr. Beery and Mr. Hatton have recently been busy on a new film, "Casey at the Bat," which was evidently a serious matter to make, as it has resulted in splitting the comedy team. Mr. Hatton will no longer be associated with Mr. Beery, but will give way to Ford Sterling. This is an illustration of the tragedy of comedy, or the tyranny of stars.

Isadore and Eileen.

EVERY now and again some producer is bound to remember the millions made by "Abie's Irish Rose," and therefore turn his hand to making a photoplay dealing with the Irish and the Jews. The idea receives great encouragement because "The Cohens and the Kellys," based on the play, "Two Blocks Away," is one of the two biggest financial hits of the year. The latest yarn concerned with this type of romance is "Private Izzy Murphy," which title rather makes one anticipate something comical. The film gets off to a farcical start, but after a scene or two it decides to adopt a heart-tugging attitude, and although "Stylish Delicatessen" is occasionally in view, one is reminded that Mr. Murphy, alias Isadore Goldberg, is very much chagrined at having deceived Eileen Cohannigan, whom he loves. He had told her that his name was Isadore Patrick Murphy, and he thought that she believed it. He had told it to the keen-eyed recruiting contingent of the Fighting Sixty-ninth, and he knew that they believed it, for they let him fight for Uncle Sam.

George Jessel is unfortunate in having selected this vehicle for his first screen venture. He ought to have had something after the style of "The Jazz Singer," or a story in which there is really good comedy. The direction of this production cannot be hailed as anything that will be remembered with great pleasure, for there are drawn-out, tearful close-ups, and in several chapters, including that in which Private Izzy Murphy returns from France, there is an unrestrained attempt to wring sobs from the audiences.

NEW PARAMOUNT THEATRE

THE new Paramount Theatre in Times Square will be opened next Friday evening, and the film attraction for the auspicious occasion in the place of amusement that has cost $3,000,000 (the whole structure, including the office floors, is valued at $17,000,000) will bear the modest title, "God Gave Me Twenty Cents."

This new theatre and building was conceived by Adolph Zukor, President of Famous Players-Lasky Corporation. Harold B. Franklin, Vice President of Publix Theatres Corporation, has supervised the work from the time it was commenced a year ago, and the other day, when he escorted a representative of THE NEW YORK TIMES over the theatre section of the edifice, he lost no opportunity in epurring on the efforts of the carpenters, plasterers, electricians and others. They spoke of having only ten more days in which to finish their work, but Mr. Franklin reminded them all that they really had thirty days, inasmuch as they were working on three eight-hour shifts.

Several years ago Mr. Zukor hoped to erect a fitting home and theatre for his company on Broadway. With that end in view he purchased the site of the old Putnam Building, and because his attention was engrossed with other affairs he turned the construction work of the new building over to a building committee, of which Mr. Franklin was chosen chairman.

Model First Constructed.

This committee engaged C. W. and George L. Rapp as architects, and a number of designs were rejected before the plans were decided upon. In addition to the final drawings, a small model of the theatre was built, complete in every detail, and careful study of this miniature resulted in many effective changes.

The theatre architecture is that of the French Renaissance period, the lower five stories being Indiana limestone, carved in heavy relief.

At the entrance to the theatre there is a semi-circular colonnade of strikingly veined marble columns, supported on a black and gold base, which itself is approximately one story high. Above this is a dome of gold, the top of which is fifty feet above the floor. The opposite side of this hall is formed by a tremendous glass window opening on the street. A bronze and crystal chandelier hangs from the centre of the dome. In the day this lobby will be flooded with daylight, while at night it will sparkle with hundreds of electric lights.

Mr. Franklin called attention to the Hall of Nations, which is entered from the lobby. On one side of the wall of this hall is a collection of stones from various parts of the world, thirty-seven in all. They were obtained by the foreign offices of Famous Players. Each of these stones has a special significance, and in some cases they were officially presented by foreign Governments. The story of each stone is told on bronze tablets. Another feature of this Hall of Nations is a bronze bas-relief of Thomas A. Edison, the great inventor, who, incidentally, is expected to attend the first performance in the Paramount Theatre.

Then there is what is called the Grand Hall, which is 150 feet long and 45 feet wide, with a height of 50 feet. The dome is supported by massive marble columns, and at the opposite end of this space is a stairway of marble, widening up to the mezzanine landings. Behind the stairway are located the elevators, which are arranged to carry passengers to all levels of the theatre. It was explained by Mr. Franklin that in order to get the quantity of marble required it was necessary to open up a quarry in Italy that had been closed for forty years. Mr. Franklin called attention to the ceiling panel, "The Spirit of Light."

In the basement is a lounge room for men and women. It is known as the Elizabethan Room and is furnished in that period. The walls are paneled in walnut. Other rooms leading from the Elizabethan Room are the College Room, a men's smoking room, where the emblems of universities help in the decorative scheme; the Chinoiserie (ladies' smoking room) is a mixture of French and Chinese decoration; the Venetian Room (ladies' cosmetic room) is an unusual feature. Other public rooms are Peacock Alley, the Club Room, the Hunting Room, the Jade Room, the Powder Box, the Marie Antoinette Room, the Music Room, the Colonial and Empire Rooms.

Special Music for Those Waiting.

There will be a special installation of amplification which brings into the Grand Hall and adjoining rooms the music played on the stage, as well as the organ and orchestral music. In addition to this there is a music room overlooking the Grand Hall. This chamber will serve the purpose of entertaining persons who are waiting to get into the theatre. Here concerts also will be given by a string orchestra and artists.

The design of the auditorium is of French Renaissance influence and the color scheme is of ivory, rose-red and turquoise blue. The organ chambers are located on both sides of the proscenium arch, and the grills consist of screens of crystal on which a "tree of life" is worked out effectively. The great organ, one of the largest in the world, is of the orchestral unit type, occupying four chambers and is equipped with every conceivable stop.

Indirect lighting in three colors is installed around the stage proscenium facia, the organ grill frames, the soffit of the balcony, the main ceiling, as well as the side walls. This is supplemented by bronze crystal fixtures which hang from the ceiling along the side walls. There are also huge brackets of bronze slung between the side arches.

The drapes are red and gold in a figured satin damask, and are hung in the archways and organ arches. A velvet and silk valance, embroidered with gold, hangs from the proscenium arch, with curtains to match. The chairs have been designed for comfort, the ends of the aisles being lighted.

The Orchestra Elevator.

The orchestra pit is designed to hold an orchestra of 70, and can be raised and lowered on an elevator. This elevator travels from a point seven feet below the stage level to the level of the stage. The stage footlights are of the disappearing type, so that the platform of the orchestra pit becomes an apron of the stage. The platform is mounted on a carriage and the whole orchestra can automatically roll on to the stage, leaving the apron on which performers will appear. The organ console is also on an elevator at one end of the pit. All elevator controls are operated from the orchestra leader's or organ stand, and they are arranged so as to be duplicated from the switchboard.

The ventilation installation is what is known as the "down feed" system, the air being brought in through openings in the ceiling and drawn off at the floor by blowers and fans. All the air brought into the house comes through a washer.

Mr. Franklin opened a door and instantly a man sprang from another topsy-turvy chamber.

"Are you the detective?" asked Mr. Franklin.

"Yes," replied the man.

It turned out that this individual was guarding the bronze bust of Mr. Zukor made by Jo Davidson.

Mr. Franklin is particularly proud of the organ, and he said that the delicate strings were the nearest approach to the violin yet accomplished. The flutes, clarinets and oboes are realistic imitations of those instruments, he added.

"To try and give you some idea of the size of this organ," said Mr. Franklin, "let me say that CCCC pipe is 34 inches square at the large end, tapering down to six inches, and is 32 feet in length. It is made of the finest quality pine, two and a quarter inches thick and weighs some 1,250 pounds. In contrast to this the speaking length of the smallest pipe is about three-quarters of an inch and the diameter of a straw, weighing about one-half an ounce."

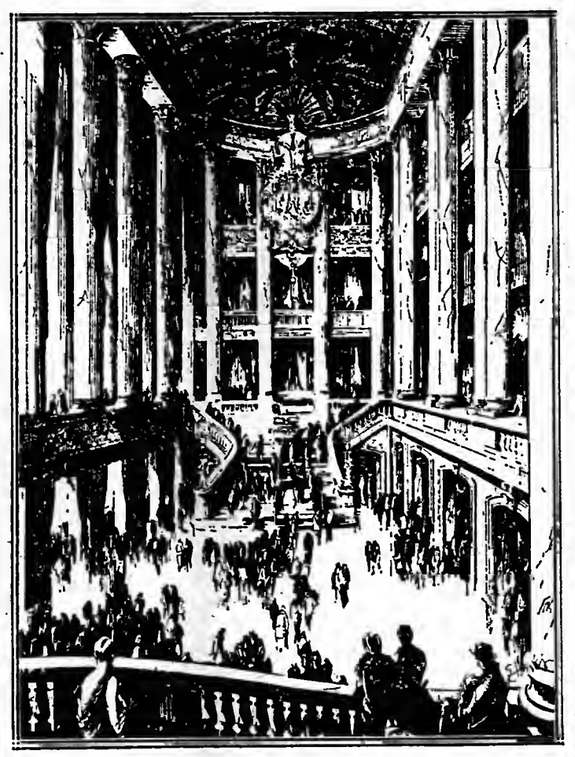
Art and Refreshment.

The walls of the various rooms of the theatre will be adorned with paintings by well known artists. There will be 56 of these canvases.

The producing department has plenty of rooms for offices, dressing rooms, and rehearsal theatres. There are two projection rooms, and the chief executives of the Publix Theatres Corporation will even have private shower baths and tubs.

And another interesting feature of the theatre will be the fact that one can be served with tea at all times in the lounge room.

Having made a picture called "While London Sleeps," Rin-Tin-Tin, the Belgian police dog, is to go South for his next screen adventure, the story of which will be called "The Hills of Kentucky."



Grand Hall of the Paramount Theatre.

PROJECTION JOTTINGS

Two New Foreign Actresses Arrive—Also Another German Director

RICHARD A. ROWLAND, Vice President and General Manager of the First National Pictures, returned from Europe aboard the Olympic last week, bringing with him Natalie Barrache, a Russian actress; Maria Corda, a German stage and screen star, and her husband, Alexander Korda, one of the foremost Ufa directors.

After a brief stay in New York Natalie Barrache will go to California to start work on a picture based on the romantic incidents of the Russian Revolution. The Kordas will also go to the West Coast.

Mr. Rowland met the Russian actress in Paris, where she had gone to consider a contract for leading rôles. Impressed by her beauty, Mr. Rowland offered her a contract to come to America, which she accepted. In Berlin he found Korda and likewise engaged him.

Alexander Korda is the winner of the International Film Exposition prize of 1920, which was awarded the Ufa director for two pictures, "The Sunken World" and "Rulers of the Sea." His first picture of international reputation was Mark Twain's "Prince and Pauper," which he made in Vienna.

Mr. Korda's most recent films are "A Modern DuBarry" and "Dance Fever." It has not yet been announced what pictures he will direct for First National at Burbank.

"The Trail of the Pioneer" and "The Flag That Went Down Flying," pictured by the Film Mutual Benefit Bureau, are to be exhibited at the home of Mrs. Robert Weeks Kelley, 510 Park Avenue, tomorrow afternoon.

"The Silent Lover," with Milton Sills, is the feature attraction at the Mark Strand.

"The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari" is continuing at the Fifth Avenue Playhouse, 66 Fifth Avenue.

"The Big Parade" will celebrate a year on Broadway on Nov. 18. It remains today as popular as the first week, when it was presented at the Astor Theatre.

Wallace Beery and Raymond Hatton will be seen for another week at the Rialto in "We're in the Navy Now."

The picturization of the play "What Price Glory" is to open on Nov. 22 at the Sam H. Harris Theatre. Edmund Lowe officiates as Sergeant Quirt, Victor McLaglen as Captain Flagg and Dolores Del Rio as Charmaine. The film took seven months to produce. It was directed by Raoul Walsh, director of Douglas Fairbanks's "The Thief of Bagdad."

"Upstage," with Norma Shearer, is the feature at the Capitol. They call this production "a play without players," for the audience is taken behind the scenes of a vaudeville theatre. It is based on a story by Walter de Leon and is directed by Monta Bell. Oscar Shaw plays the principal male rôle.

Lois Moran, the young actress who was discovered (for the screen) by Samuel Goldwyn, will be one of the figurantes in "God Gave Me Twenty Cents," the picture to be presented next Friday at the new Paramount Theatre. Miss Moran scored her initial film success in Henry King's picturization of "Stella Dallas," and since that time she has appeared in a number of pictures. Her career is another instance of the quick way to fame via the motion picture.

Doris Kenyon, Lloyd Hughes and Louise Fazenda are the featured players in First National's "Ladies At Play," the new Hippodrome offering.

The Cosmopolitan production, "The Flaming Forest," is to be the principal attraction next week at the Capitol.

The Fox Film Corporation announces that F. W. Murnau, producer of "The Last Laugh," is making excellent progress in Hollywood on "Sunrise," his first American production. After spending a month on location at Lake Arrowhead, Cal., in the San Bernardino Mountains, Mr. Murnau has returned to the Fox West Coast studio to begin work on exterior sets.

Jason Robards, now playing the leading male rôle opposite Dolores Costello in "The Third Degree," has been engaged on a contract by Warner Brothers. Mr. Robards is a recruit from the stage. His footlights début was in "The Country Boy," under Edgar Selwyn's management. He also appeared in "Turn to the Right," "Lightnin'" and "Seventh Heaven."

Greta Nissen is to be seen in Adolphe Menjou's forthcoming picture, "Blonde or Brunette." Arlette Marchal will officiate as the brunette and Miss Nissen will portray the blonde.

"Eagle of the Sea," directed by Frank Lloyd, who made the "Sea Hawk," is the feature at the Rivoli. The story is based on Charles Tenney Jackson's novel, "Captain Sazarac." Florence Vidor and Ricardo Cortez fill the principal rôles.

Belle Bennett has been engaged to play the title rôle in a picture to be known as "Mother."

"The Gorilla Hunt" has been acquired for distribution by Film Booking Offices. It was produced by Ben Burbridge in Africa. Burbridge is said to have caught several young gorillas with his hands, and he is shown capturing these beasts. He also cranked his camera until a gorilla weighing 400 pounds got within thirty feet of him, and then quickly grabbed his gun and killed the brute.

Marshall Neilan has been engaged by Joseph M. Schenck to direct Constance Talmadge's new picture, "Colette," a story by Hans Kraely, Ernst Lubitsch's scenario writer.

"Body and Soul" will be George Fitzmaurice's first picture for First National. It is a special screen story by Carey Wilson.

Joseph M. Schenck has bought "The Purple Mask" for a Roland West production. As a play it was acted in this country by Leo Ditrichstein at the Booth Theatre. The leading character is a famous highwayman known as "The Purple Mask," who terrified the Parisians during the early nineteenth century when Napoleon was the First Consul. Both in Paris and in this country the play proved a great success.

"His Last Affair," Norma Shearer's new starring vehicle, went into production last week. Robert Z. Leonard is directing this picture.

FIRST METROPOLITAN "TURANDOT" IN THIS WEEK'S MUSIC

PUCCINI'S POSTHUMOUS OPERA

Musical Setting for a Chinese Subject—Composer's Sketch for a Finale Completed by Franco Alfano

By OLIN DOWNES.

UNDER date of Jan. 21, 1921, Giacomo Puccini wrote Mr. Gatti-Casazza of the Metropolitan of divers things. Part of the letter, of which a few lines are reproduced on this page, read: "I am arranging an opera, very original —Turandot"—from our Gozzi, and from Schiller in his German translation. Adami and Simoni are writing the libretto, which will be very different from the original tale. It will be full of scenic surprises and also full of emotions. I think already of a première at the Metropolitan in a couple of years. • • •

"See if you can find ever there some Chinese music—especially old music—and ask if there are some records of even modern Chinese music. You would do me a great favor."

The Metropolitan première of which Puccini already thought in 1921 and which he anticipated as taking place two years later, will occur next Tuesday night. The opera took not two years, as Puccini predicted, but nearly four to compose. The work was almost complete when Puccini left his home at Torre del Lago for Brussels for the operation from which in November, 1924, he died. He had presentiments. He wrote Adami, a little before the end: "Here I am, alas! poor me. • • • And Turandot'?"

When Puccini had gone it was found that the opera had been finished so far as composition was concerned, but not instrumentation. The last duet, the music for the finale, was done, and had been clear in the composer's mind, as a letter to his librettists showed, as early as May of the year of his death. Arturo Toscanini, to whom Puccini had played his opera and directed the première at La Scala, entrusted Franco Alfano, the composer and Puccini's intimate friend, with the little amount of work still necessary on the score. This consisted in the orchestration of the last duet and finale, and the writing in of a few short transition passages, constructed by Alfano from material already in the score, such as the theme of Turandot's riddles and that of the Imperial Hymn. The world première of "Turandot" took place at La Scala, Toscanini conducting, the 25th of last April. The leading members of the cast were Rosa Raisa, Turandot; Zamboni, Liù; Pieta—who appears here in the same rôle—Calaf, and Rimini, Ping. There was a gorgeous scenic setting.

There have since been performances in Dresden, Buenos Aires, Vienna, where Mme. Jeritza created the title rôle for the local public.

Puccini exercised his customary care in the selection and adaptation of his libretto. He had been inactive as a composer for several years, when he at last sought out Renato Simoni, the dramatic critic, and Giuseppe Adami, the playwright, and asked them for a book. After many conferences, and to Puccini's complete satisfaction, the subject of Turandot was selected. Other themes had been considered, one a subject taken from Dickens, dealing with life in mean streets in London. It was Simoni who finally hit upon the idea of the famous dramatic fable of Gozzi.

No doubt this subject appealed to Puccini in a considerable degree because of its possibilities for exotic musical coloring. He searched far and wide for material of Chinese music. Not only were the records that he asked from America sent to him; he ransacked collections and libraries for information and for musical motives. He told Mr. Minnigerode, the correspondent of THE TIMES, that this opera would be Chinese, completely Chinese, but the Chinese of long, long ago. "There is not a character in the opera," he said, "that is not Chinese. In it I shall have the Hymn of Confucius." He added with a laugh that he had never been in Peking, but knew New York's Chinatown. He looked forward to a third visit to this country when "Turandot" should be produced. This opera was to be in its way a companion piece to "Madama Butterfly," which, Puccini insisted, was his finest work—only the new opera would be Chinese. "Do you know, I feel Chinese chords actually itching at my finger tips? Quite a while ago I sent to America for all the Chinese phonograph records or jazz numbers that might have Oriental themes in them, for I feel that there lies the orchestration of the future!" It was the British Museum which furnished Puccini the only existing example of the codex of the ancient imperial Chinese rhythm.

There will be occasion later to discuss the details of Puccini's score with its coloring of the Far East, of which it sparingly quotes certain melodies. Chinese music, however, is here present as a color rather than a literal reminiscence, save in such instances as have been noted. Puccini was insistent, with his instinct for theatre and public, that there should be plenty of humor in the situations and that, above all, the story should be "humanized." The human and emotional element is especially to the fore in the figure of the slave girl, Liù, not in the original drama, whose sacrificial passion for the Prince saves that youth from the consequences of his quixotic gallantry. There are new Gilbert-and-Sullivan names for the Chinese dignitaries whose equanimities are so seriously disturbed by the beautiful, terrible and imperious Turandot. The traditional masks of Gozzi comedy are abandoned in the opera, but the element of burlesque in the persons of Ping, Pong and Pang is retained, and their pages are among the most amusing and effective of Puccini's composition.

There is not the realism in "Turandot" that there was in "Madama Butterfly." The opera is from beginning to end fantastical in color, grotesque, Oriental, gorgeous of setting, further from the present than anything else Puccini attempted.

The rising curtain reveals the walls of the ancient Imperial Palace of Peking. Bastions which surround it are broken on the right hy a huge covered portico, upon which are sculptured monsters of fable, the unicorn, the phoenix, with pillars supported by the backs of monstrous turtles. And at the foot of the portico hangs suspended a great gong, and the sun is sinking, flooding ths ancient city with its splendor. There is sinister business afoot. An excited crowd in the square before the portico listens to a mandarin proclaiming the doom of the young Prince of Persia, who, a suitor for the hand of Turandot, has failed to solve her three riddles, and therefore must die. The crowd cries out in horror. The land is weary of the perpetual procession of death. The excitement grows. An old man in the crowd, accompanied by a young girl who tries to protect him, is thrown to ths ground. The girl cries for help. It comes in the form of a yonth who rushes to their aid and recognizes his own father. The old man is Timur, exiled King of the Tartars; the youth is Calaf, his son; ths girl is the slave Liù, passionately enamored of Calaf, willing, as the event proves, to die for him. The identity of the King and his son must be kept secret.

And now appear the executioners on the bastions, sharpening their swords for the death of the Persian Prince. A dirge introduces the procession to ths scaffold, led by the victim and dignitaries of the court. Ths crowd execrates Turandot. Calaf, called now the Unknown Prince, cries shame upon her cruelty • • • He has not seen her! Suddenly Turandot appears, the crowd falls prostrate in fear and adoration, the Unknown Prince is fathoms deep in lovs. Turandot makes a savage gesture, ths executioner nods, the Parsian Prince goes to his death. The square is empty save for the exiles. Ths Prince has made his resolvs. He, too, will risk his life in attempting to solve the enigmas and win the creature of chastity, cruelty and pride.

There is a scene of comedy in which Ping, Pang and Pong do their best to turn Calaf from his rash decision. It is no use. The ghosts of Turandot's dead lovers appear, warning him; the executioner returns, bearing the head of his last victim. Calaf is blind and deaf to it all. He rushes forward impetuously, sounds three times the gong which is the signal of a fresh suitor, crying "Turandot! Turandot! Turandot!" as the curtain falls.

The first scene of the second act is that in which Ping, Pang and Pong recount China's glorious past, lethargic, content, until the advent of the destructive Turandot. And now? It is three sounds of the gong, three riddles and off with more heads. In the year of the Mouse there were six and of the Dog eight; in this current year, the terrible year of Tiger, there have been twelve, and no doubt the Unknown Prince will fill out the unlucky number. Now they are reduced from former dignity to mere Ministsrs of the Executionsr. A lively scene, culminating in the trio of prayer to the Tiger, that at last this Grand Marshal of the Skies will suffer the Princess to yield, the nuptial bed to be prepared and peace once more to reign in China. Scene II: The open square before the royal palace. The crowd flitters in. Come the mandarins in vestments of blus and gold and the eight Wise Men, each with a scroll containing the answers to the riddles of Turandot. The Emperor of China takes his seat upon the throne. At the foot of the staircase stands the Unknown Prince, with Timur and Liù near him. Turandot looks disdainfully upon him. She addresses the crowd. Long years ago a grandmother of hers, the young and innocent Princess Lo-u-ling, was dragged away hy a Tartar invader and violated. For this outrage the suitors of Turandot shall suffer. Their blood shall avenge the wronged one.

Now for the three Enigmas: "In depths of night an iridescent phantom takes wing over suffering humanity. The supplications of the multitude arise. The phantom disappears, hut each night it is born anew, to fade away with the light of day." Inspired, the Prince answers: "Hope." Confused, Turandot proposes the second riddle. "It spurts like a flame and yet is not a flame. • • • If thou dreamest of conquest, it ardently flows. • • • Of the setting sun it has the vivid glow." And the Prince answers "Blood."

Turandot, with ferocity, rushes down the stairs as ths Prince kneels. She is demoniac in her apprehension and menace. "Ice which gives thee fire. And from thy fire ice begsts. Candiu and obscure. If freedom ehe grants thee, into greater slavery thou failest. If as a slave she accepts thee, a King thou shalt be." And the Prince, his soul in his syes, cries, "TURANDOT." Wild rejoicing. The riddles are solved. But Turandot is still untamed. By every plea she begs not to hs cast into the stranger's arms. Would the Unknown have her against her will? "No," replies Calaf. "I want thee ardent with love." He proposes another riddle. If Turandot answers it shs shall have her freedom and his head: What is his name?

The last act passes in the Palace Gardens, near Turandot'e chamber. Voices of heralds proclaim that no one shall sleep that night. The crowd, in a panic, rushes into the Gardens to the Prince. Turandot has decreed that it is necessary to discover his name or suffsr death. Timur and Liù ars dragged in. Turandot appears herself. Tear the secret from them! A torturer advances upon Liù, who knows the name, who must confess. The faithful girl, fearful that in the pangs of suffering she might betray her beloved Prince, snatches a knifs from the belt of a soldier, stabs herself, and falls lifeless.

At last the heart of Turandot is touched. What can be the mysterious power which prompts a woman to do this! The Prince knowe. He advances, claiming his right. He takes the chaste and ths proud one in his arms. Turandot is conquered. From the first she had fought against what she knew to he her fate. It was in resisting love that she had heen so cruel. The Prince reveals his name—Calaf, son of Timur, the Tartar King. Turandot replies. She has the answer to the riddle. The name of the Prince is Love.

Such is the libretto, compounded partly of Gozzi and Schiller and more of his own directions and theatrical craft, to which Puccini set his music.

TO PRESENT NEW COMPOSER

FOUR works new in this city and a Stravinsky revival, with Serge Koussevitzky as conductor, will make the program of the second concert by the League of Composers this season. Mr. Koussevitzky, who appears by courtesy of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will lead an ensemble of players chosen from that organization. The program includes two works which will be heard for the first time anywhere — Bela Bartok's "Village Scenes," the latest composition from his pen, written especially for the league on a commission undertaken two years ago, and Louis Gruenberg's "Creation," a setting of the poem of that name by James Weldon Johnson. Bartok's work is for chamber orchestra and four female voices. Gruenberg's work is for an instrumental ensemble and a singer, who, for this evening, will be Julius Bledsoe, the negro baritone, late of "Deep River."

The Stravinsky revival will be that of "L'Histoire du Soldat," written in 1918 and first produced in America with full instrumental ecore by the League of Composere in 1924. This work will replace "Mavra," previously announced on the program. "L'Histoire," "Renard" and "Mavra" are works of the sams character and more or less of one period, the latter two being for voices and chamber orchestra, and all three lending themselves to stage pantomime.

Anton von Webern's much-discussed "Five Orchestral Pieces" will be heard for the first time in America. The same thing holds trus of Hans Krasa's chamber symphony—a "Pastorale" and "Marche."

The league will give a concert of modern works at the Brooklyn Museum on Friday, Nov. 19, under the auspices of the Société Anonyme. The program includes works by Malipiero, Frederick Jacobi, Marion Bauer, Stravinsky and Emerson Whithorne; songs by Richard Hammond and Lazare Saminsky. The assisting artists will be the Helen Tas Quartet, Marion Rous and Ruth Rodgers.

ENGLAND'S CONCERT GIVERS

HAROLD SAMUEL, who will be heard in a Bach week in the course of the New York Winter season, has been doing the same thing in London, much to the edification of the critic of The London Times: "The very fact that these concerts are an established custom has an influence on ths pleasurs we get from them, for Mr. Samuel has collected his own audience and come to an understanding with them. There is an intimacy and a certain informality in the atmosphere which are absent from the ordinary recital, and Mr. Samuel can, if he is not quite satisfied with the way he has played a piece, go back and do it again without making us feel that he is faking liberties with us or giving himself away. In this atmosphere it is the easier to appreciate the steady balance of his playing, the firm rhythms and the entrancing tone in the quieter passages, and to forgive an occasional tendency to becoms dry and hard. The main thing is that Mr. Samuel has sufficient reserves of power, as he has apparently infinite reserves of pieces ready in his memory, to keep the interest unflagging throughout."

The famous Czechoslovak Choir, formed hy the teachers of Prague, gave a concert under the direction of Professor Metod Doiezil at Queen's Hall, Oct. 26. This male-voiced choir took part in the Czechoslovak musical festival in London in 1919. The members of the choir are all secondary schoolmasters of Czechoslovakia, where choral singing is as assidnously cultivated as in England. Their mastery of choral technic has compelled the younger generation of composers to keep pace with them in their choral compositions.

The Leeds Repertory Company rsvived "The Cherokee," a ballad-opera which had a great vogue at the time of its original production at Drury Lane in 1794. It was revived at the same theatre eight years later and since then has never been seen on the stage.

The annnal Eastbourns festival took place Nov. 5 to 13. Among ths mnsicians who took part were: Sir Thomas Beecham, Sir Edward Elgar, Sir Henry Wood, Harold Samuel, Edna Thomas, John Goss, Elizabeth Schumann, Muriel George, Ernest Butcher and Arthur Catterall. Captain Amers was the conductor-in-chief and organizer of the festival.

The Covent Garden Opera Syndicate annonnces that it will sponsor a short season of opera to begin May 2 and end June 24. The artists have not yet been engaged, but it is learned that Bruno Walter and Vincenzo Bellezza will he among ths conductors.

The Livsrpool Repertory Opera Company opened its season Oct. 21 with "Pagliacci" and "Madame s'Amuse," It will give performances of Rutland Boughton'e "Queen of Cornwall," Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas," Monteverde's "Orfeo" and Holbrooke's "The Stranger."

The Duke of Connaught formally opened the extension to the Royal Academy of Music Oct. 19. The additions consist of a new rehearsal theatre, a lecture hall and several smaller rooms. When the huildings in the Marylebone Road were erected there were 500 students on the books. At present the number is over 1,000.

Orchestral concerts during the third week of October were more numerous than usual. Sir Landon Ronald conducted the Royal Albert Hall Orchestra at the Palladium, in a program which included Dvorak's "New World" Symphony, Oct. 17. Albert Coates directed the opening concert of the London Symphony Orchestra's twenty-first series at Queen's Hall Monday evening, Oct. 18. The program contained Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony and Schumann's pisno concerto, with Gieseking as the soloist. Mr. Coates directed the second national concert of the British Broadcasting Company at the Albert Hall on Thursday evening; the program included Elgar's "Variations," Scriabin's "Poëme de L'Extase" and the "Emperor" concerto, in which Lamond played the solo part. The Queen's Hall concert on Saturday under Sir Henry Wood served to introduce "Taras Bulba," the new rhapsody hy Leos Janacek.

The thirty-second season of promenade concerts at Queen's Hall ended Saturday evening, Oct. 16, whils in the afternoon Messrs. Chappell inaugurated eight matinee promenade concerts as a substitute for their old-time ballad concerts. The programs of the former conform to the type associated with the popular Saturday evening promenads concerts. Sir Henry Wood directed the New Queen's Hall Orchestra.

Concerts were given hy the Don Cossack Choir at the Albert Hall, Arthur Rubinstein at Queen's Hall, Gieseking at Grotrian Hall, Mark Hambourg and others.

"The Daughter of the Regiment," "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Pagliacci" were givsn at the old Vic during the week.

It is possible that Queen's Hall, the centre of orchestral music in London, may be turned into a moving-picture theatre. Messrs. Chappell have been made an offer, which thsy will probably accept. Their recent refusal to radio their concerts compelled the British Broadcasting Company to enter ths concert field. The B. B. C. engaged the largest orchestra in Europe and inaugurated a series of orchestral concerts at the Albert Hall at one-third the prices of the Queen's Hall concerts. As the British Government is behind the broadcasting company, private concerns will have little chance of competing successfully. The opinion is expressed that the private symphony orchestras will disappear and that they will he replaced by Government concerts, which will be broadcast all over the kingdom at a nominal cost to radio users.

MUSICAL ACTIVITIES OVERSEA

Plans and Productions in the Foreign Capitals—Recent Artistic Developments in Berlin and Elsewhere

BERLIN, Oct. 30, 1926.—In all matters of policy the Germans like to bo thoroughly reassured by their politicians; so, when Herr Stresemann recently confahulated with M. Briand at Thoiry, where the two spent the afternoon smoking pipes of peace in loving friendship, the Berlin concert managers promntly decided that the last few remaining war barriers were down, with the result that Jacques Thibaud was announced as ths second soloist of the season with ths Philharmonic Orchestra, the first having heen Elly Ney. Nor did the managers act unwisely. When he appeared on the platform at the Philharmonic Thibaud received an ovation which speaks well for the coming artistic relationship between Germany and France, and when he completed a superh performance of the Lalo "Symphonis Espagnole," ably seconded hy Furtwängler, there remained little douht as to the welcome other able French musicians may expect to find in the concert halls of Berlin. Vive la paix! Music lovers here have long wished for the return of Thibaud, whose elegant and unsullied violin styis held them spellbound in the prewar days. His selection of the Lalo piecs conid not have been happier. This surefire creation was first made familiar to German concertgoers hy Pablo de Sarasate, always in his lifetime an overwhelming favorite here—who returned even when his prowess as a virtuoso had perceptihly declined. Sarasate created a tremendous vogue for the "Symphonie Espagnole." and in the old days here it was marvelous to behold low ths demand for it never seemed to end. In the seasons 1908 to 1914 it was literally played dozens of times, year in and year out. With the cessation of the appearances of illustrious international artists in Germany many of the non-Teutonic compositions were put on the shelf; and even since the war, except for occasional performances with piano accompaniment, M. Lalo's chef-d'oeuvre has remained unheard. As a piano accompaniment scarcely suffices to enhance the music of the solo instrument with the gorgeous orchestral investure supplied so lavishly hy the composer, it does not taks much imagination to picture the supreme satisfaction of the audience upon once more being ahls to hear a performance of the masterpiece in its original form.

Honegger's "Chant de Joie," presented on the sams program, awakened far more enthusiasm than did Franck'e symphony, played two weeks ago at the opening Philharmonic concert. It is somewhat peculiar that the Germans are making a seeming attempt to claim Honegger as their own, citing (in the case of ths "Chant de Joie") his supposed leaning toward Bach and Handel, while they turn their thumbs down on modest César Franck hy damning him with faint praise. However, Franck is dead and Honegger is living; and perhaps this explains, more than anything else, the attitude of the local critics, who doubtless have readily perceived the opportunity to do a bit for improving the general aspect of modern German art hy enhancing the already strongly established reputation of a living composer whose name sounds and reads sufficiently Tentonic, and who might on every opportuns occasion be claimed as of German origin—a thing entirely "ausgeschlossen" in the case of Franck, whose Gallicism was too plainly evident.

Furtwaengler in Berlin.

Furtwängler's two seasons with the Philharmonic Orchestra in Nsw York have mads him the man of the hour here and his name is constantly on every concertgoer's tongue. The writer remembers with pleasure the cordial greeting given this great conductor when he first appeared at Carnegie Hall two seasons ago, and also the ovation he received at the conclusion of his final concert that year; hut it is considerable of a question whether Herr Furtwängler has since been able to keep stride with the tremendous inspiration which caused him to work such wonders in the all too few concerts he had charge of at Carnegie during the Winter of 1925. This was a thought even came to mind during his prolonged activity in New York last season. Since having had the opportunity to study Furtwängler on his "home grounds," to use a timely baseball idiom, one realizes anew how difficult it is to rise superior to a sensationally successful début before an exacting public. Furtwängler's "Till Eulenspiegel" at the opening concert here was scarcely what one might expect after having witnessed his previous amazing handling of this and other Strauss compositions; nor was the former inspiration surpassed in any of his offerings here this season. The Berliners continue to acclaim him, and justly so, for even as he stands at present he is one of the world's foremost contemporary interpreters; hut it is to be sincerely hoped that a kindly fate will deliver him here and in New York from the consequences of meteoric popularity and restore to his baton arm the old-time power and fire which wrung ready admiration from even the coldest and hardest of Vienna's, Berlin's and New York's critics.

An American Singer.

One of the first recitals of the current Berlin season was given hy Elizabeth Day, an American soprano, who had difficulty in appearing before a New York recital audience last Winter because of postponement made necessary as the result of a real outdoor snowstorm. Mrs. Day had tronhies aplenty here, too, hut went ahead with her scheduled recital at ths last moment, and for her pluck was rewarded with considerahly more than just the customary succès d'estime. It appears that the ambitious lady had engaged Respighi to conduct the Berlin Philharmonic in a concert of his own works, including two songs. Local concertgoers were thus to hsve had their first view of the much-discussed Italian composer, which of course meant that ths occasion would have been one of more than ordinary importance. However, when we arrived at the Beethoven Saal on the night of the recital it was announced that Signor Respighi had, because of indisposition, been unable to appear, and that a local conductor, Oskar Fried, would take his place. Moreover, the program was entirely changed except for the two songs. During the intermission Mrs. Day was prevailed upon to give her version of Respighi's defection, and it appears that he chose to withdraw from the arrangement because of dissatisfaction with the publicity methods used, claiming that as one of Italy's foremost composers he had scarcely received the printed emphasis due him in a world city liks Berlin. The case seems to have some similarity with Mascagni's reported "reneging" on a contract he is said to have made with the owner of an American itinerant opera company, only in the Respighi matter there were no financial transactions involved, Mrs. Day remarking forcibly that "Respighi didn't get a dollar of my money."

Other Americans who have appeared with success here this season include Roland Hayes, Edna Thomas and George Meader. The latter's Liederabend was approved warmly by the critics, much more so than was the case with another Metropolitan tenor, Rudolf Laubenthal, whose joint recital with Frau Laubenthal was handled rather unmercifully in the press, though his popularity as a footlight favorite has scarcely suffered thereby.

Echoes of the Bach Festival.

It seemed something of an anomaly when the fonrteenth German Bach Festival was allotted to Berlin, and so the writer was not surprised at the attitude of some of the more discerning critics here in their summing up of what had heen accomplished in the various concerts of the festival, which took place from Sept. 30 to Oct. 3 inclusive. These critics openly deplored the choice of such a city as Berlin as the scene of an elaborate presentation of the immortal Sebastian's music, claiming that the enterprise scarcely had a chance to cope with the many counter-attractions of the metropolis, and that had it not been for the widespread and enthusiastic patronage of provincial visitors, there probably would have heen very meager audiences at the various performances in concert halls and churches here. It is certainly true that a large city is not so well adapted for a music or opera festival as is a small one, which readily explains the popularity of such places as Baireuth and Donaueschingen.

The Bach Festival was supposed to have provided an opportunity for the Berliners to become acquainted with some of the master's less known works, but these self-same Berliners were not represented in any appreciable number, at least not at the concerts preceding the final one featuring the Great Mass. This took place on a Sunday night in the hall of the Philharmonie; when the Berliners came storming the place en masse they found that the tables had been turned on them, for the provincials had all the tickets and the box office was closed down tight, with a big sign attached, "Ausverkauft" (all sold out). This was poetic justice with a vengeance, as the Great Mass was unquestionably the choice morsel of the whole undertaking and did much to atone for what had gone before, especially for the exceedingly uninteresting and dry exposition of the music of Bach's predecessors.

From a good point of vantage the writer observed the assembling of the audience on this occasion and saw things that at times almost made him think he was dreaming. The garb of the last century were again in hand, for were not the costumes worn by these provincial ladies and gentlemen exactly the same as those so aptly described by the writers of that interesting period? One saw trailing, voluminous skirts aplenty, and King Gillette would have shuddered with horror had he beheld the sudden growth of whiskers to be observed on all sides. Old-fashioned dress coats, such as are now seen in America in burlesque shows, adorned the stalwart frames of the men, while the young people were attired in fashions which plainly bespoke an utter ignorance of boyish bobs or bell-bottomed trousers. These were your Bach enthusiasts, if you please, and a more reverent or attentive audience has never been seen elsewhere by the writer. Almost each and every one of these possessed carried some sort of score, in most cases a complete piano score, with the voice parts fully notated. Moreover, these scores were carefully followed, note hy note, and were not merely held in the lap for effect.

The performance of the Great Mass lasted nearly three and one-half hours, an ordeal more than anything else, even for the seasoned concertgoer, yet these provincials seemed as fresh as ever at the conclusion and cheerfully sought out their various railway stations in order to start the long and tiring journey homeward. These are the genuine Bach devotees, not the spoiled and soft inhabitants of the metropolis, who are exhausted after listening to a symphony concert lasting an hour and a half. And this is why the Berlin critics are right in saying that the Bach festival should not be given in the capital, but more rightfully in some strategically located provincial place. The writer saw not a single American at the Bach Festival, but this is surely not to be wondered at in a city which scarcely knows what American tourists look like any more. In fact, as far as music is concerned, there are more Americans giving concerts than attending them here. But more of that later.

SILENT RUSSIA

THE recent death of George Lisvitch Catoire, sometimes called the father of Russian moderaism in music, is noticed in the Moscow Contemporary Music Bulletin. Catoire was born in 1861 and early became a disciple of Tchaikovsky. It was Catoire's misfortune, it is remarked, not to be appreciated in time. When his works were recognized they were no longer considered contemporary.

The field for music in Russia is at present limited to Moscow, Leningrad, Charkoff and Rostoff; there is no widespread musical life in the provinces. Talented composers in the larger cities are writing works which have not the remotest chance of being published or heard. Three young composers are attracting the attention of critics, in spite of these limitations. They are Mosoloff, who set newspaper advertisements to music; Scherbacheff, one of the most prominent of Leningrad composers, and Melkich, whose unprinted works are admired hy a select circle.

The programs of the past season contained a great many works hy Prokofieff and Stravinsky. French composers like Satie, Milhaud and Poulenc were played for the first time in Russia at some of the chamber concerts.

Jascha Heifetz began a tour of the principal Scandinavian cities at Bergen, Norway, Nov. 6. He will play return engagements in several European cities.

"Hary Janos," a Singspiel in five "abenteuers," a prologue and epilogue, with music hy Zoltan Kodaly, was given its première at the Royal Opera Hous, Budapest, Oct. 16. Hary Janos, a popular and legendary figure in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, is a species of Hungarian Munchausen.

MUSICAL EVENTS AFIELD

Mozart's "Seraglio" in Rochester—Chicago To Hear "Witch of Salem"

MOZART'S opera, "The Abduction From the Seraglio," had what was believed to be its first American performance by the Rochester Opera Company, under the direction of Eugene Goossens, Nov. 1. It was sung in English.

"The performance won for the company a genuine ovation," wrote A. J. Warner in the Rochester Times-Union, "and entitled both Vladimir Rosing, who directed the production, and Eugene Goossens, the organization's musical director, who conducted the première, to very special congratulations. It was an achievement of which to be proud and marked a constructive step of first importance. The outstanding individual success in point of singing was made by Ethel Codd." Richard Halliley as Osmin, Albert Newcomb as Belmonte and Mary Silvstra completed the cast.

Mary Garden, who sang at a concert in the Eastman Theatre on Oct. 28 and who witnessed a rehearsal of the opera, was much impressed by the opportunities offered by the Eastman School of Music to young American singers.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, came back to Rochester Nov. 4, after an absence of four years and played its second concert in the Eastman Theatre with a huge audience that filled every seat in the house and most of the available standing room. A. J. Warner wrote in the Rochester Times-Union: "Given the combination of one of the four greatest orchestras in the country and a conductor of intensely dynamic musicianship, whose occasionally erratic temperament was in its best form, and something thrilling in the way of an orchestral fiesta was inevitable—especially with 3,500 eager listeners contributing the tremendous stimulus of their collective spontaneous enthusiasm. The result of these felicitous circumstances was an electrifying evening which culminated, at the concert's close, in an ovation for Mr. Koussevitzky and his musicians."

Mrs. Elizabeth S. Coolidge participated in the first chamber music concert which was given in the auditorium of the Library of Congress Nov. 5. She made her Washington debut in Brahms's quartet in A, playing the piano part; Wolfe Wolfinson played the violin, Herman Borodkin the viola, and Emmeran Stoeber the 'cello. The novelty on the program was Ernest Bloch's impressionistic sketches, "Landscapes." The Lenox String Quartet was heard in Haydn's Quartet in F. The second chamber concert, on Nov. 6, featured works by Beethoven, Mozart and Jacobi.

The next two concerts by the Lenox String Quartet will be given the first Friday and Saturday in December.

Ralph Thomas, formerly conductor of the Royal Opera in Hanover and Hamburg, was guest conductor with the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, Nov. 7.

The first all-Bach program ever presented by the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra was played, under the direction of Leopold Stokowski Nov. 12 and 13. The first half of the program included the first and second Brandenburg concertos and the choral prelude, "Aus der Tiefe rufe ich"; the third Brandenburg concerto and an orchestral version of the Toccata and Fugue in D minor (played in Philadelphia for the first time) made up the second part of the program.

To Stage Cadman's New Opera.

CHARLES WAKEFIELD CADMAN'S opera, "The Witch of Salem," will be given its first production by the Chicago Civic Opera this Winter. Mr. Cadman's "Shanewis" was produced by the Metropolitan Opera some years ago. Mr. Cadman is a well-known writer of songs, especially songs based on Indian themes. The music of "The Witch of Salem," according to Karleton Hackett, "has a solidarity befitting the theme, with a strain of melody running through it. There are many passages in the lyric mood, for there are lights even in this somber story, and Mr. Cadman's vein is melodic." The plot of the opera is based on early American Colonial history. The heroine, Claris, a Puritan maiden, is denounced as a witch by Sheila, her jealous rival in the affections of Arnold. Claris is haled forth to execution, but is saved from the extreme penalty by the timely remorse of Sheila. Claris and Arnold are reunited and Sheila expiates her treachery.

Richard Hale sang in the two performances of Gluck's "Orpheus" that were given in Cincinnati, Nov. 10 and 11, by the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Van der Stucken.

National Music Week will be observed in America from May 1 to 7, 1927. This date has been reaffirmed by a large vote from many cities. Last May 1,391 cities and towns took part in National Music Week festival and the indications are that the number will be still larger next year.

The Dallas Symphony Orchestra of sixty pieces will give the first of a series of six concerts, under the direction of Paul van Katwijk, Nov. 21. Celeste Morton will be the soloist. The Dallas Orchestra has been asked to give guest performances in several Texan cities.

The San Francisco Opera Company and the Los Angeles Opera Association will work on a close agreement of mutual share in artists, scenery and repertory next season. Gaetano Merola will be the general director of both seasons.

Following the example of the larger coast cities, East Bay, Cal., is seeking to form an international opera association with Antoine de Valle as director. If the plans of the association mature a series of operas will be produced in the Spring at the Oakland Auditorium. The operas chosen tentatively for the season are "Lakmé," "L'Enfant Prodigue," "Tannhäuser," "Faust," "Pagliacci" and a Stravinsky Ballet Russe, possibly the "Fire Bird."

Weyland Echols is giving a recital for the endowment fund of the Mendelssohn Club at Chicago, Sunday afternoon, Nov. 21. Mr. Echols will be the soloist with the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra, under Rudolph Ganz, Nov. 28. He will give recitals in Des Moines, Dec. 1, and in Buffalo, Dec. 3.

Reviving Christmas Carols.

AN increasing number of cities, towns and villages are adopting the custom of singing Christmas carols. Several of the larger cities, such as Detroit, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, St. Louis, Los Angeles, Denver, Dayton, Ohio, are expanding their plans for the Christmas season.

The Chicago program, which is cited as a model for other large cities, is under the auspices of the Christmas Carols for Chicago Committee, with a representative membership headed by the Mayor. In Detroit, which is the pioneer in the movement, the caroling has of late been in the hands of the Girl Scouts and the Camp Fire Girls, with a special advisory committee in charge.

In Philadelphia, where Leopold Stokowski heads the Caroling Committee of the Philadelphia Music League, it is hoped that the Sesquicentennial Festival Chorus will be turned into a permanent municipal chorus which the league hopes to have trained in units for the caroling program. It is expected in addition to have a municipal Christmas tree and a quartet of trumpeters playing from a high elevation at Independence Square preceding the appearance of the chorus. It is also expected to have old Welsh carols sung by a Welsh choir.

The caroling at Flint, Mich., is a feature of a Yuletide festival of song, which extends from the week before Christmas to the Sunday after, with "The Messiah" presented by the Community Chorus.

The Barrère Little Symphony will play at Garden City next Friday. George Barrère will appear as soloist at Wesleyan College, Middletown, Conn., on Nov. 23; at Yale University on Nov. 29, and at Princeton, Nov. 30. Mr. Barrère will make his first New York appearance this season as assisting artist, with the New York Symphony Orchestra, Dec. 2. The flutist has been associated with the orchestra for twenty-two years.

A prize of $1,000 has been offered by C. C. Birchard for the best religious cantata for mixed voices and piano accompaniment. The choral work selected for the award will be performed at Chautauqua, N. Y., during the Summer of 1927 by the Chautauqua Choir, the New York Symphony Orchestra and assisting soloists, under the direction of Professor H. Augustine Smith of the Eastern University School of Religious Education. The prize cantata will be published by Mr. Birchard. The manuscript must be sent to Professor Smith before April 1, 1927.

Walter Damrosch, approached for his opinion regarding the national anthem today by individuals who plan to start a nation-wide controversy on the subject, rose to its defense.

"Objections to 'The Star-Spangled Banner' have been voiced many times, but I do not take them seriously," he said. "The tune is said to be derived from an unworthy source—that it originated as a drinking song. It does not matter what the origin of a tune may be. This tune in itself has some inspiring quality. If properly played or sung, it is very moving.

"'The Star-Spangled Banner' has associations which no modern substitute would possess."

Paul Kochanski has begun his third transcontinental tour of the United States with an appearance in Kenosha, Wis. He will play several concerts on his way to the Pacific Coast and while there will give recitals in Portland, Spokane, Oakland, Fresno, Los Angeles, Bakersfield and Santa Monica.

The New Music Society of California will open its second season in Los Angeles, Nov. 20. The Persinger String Quartet will play works by Milhaud and Henry Cowell; D. Rudhyar will interpret several of his own piano pieces; Ethel Denny will present Arnold Schönberg's latest piano opus; Henry Cowell, the founder of the New Music Society of California, will play three of his compositions. The organization has made arrangements for a yearly exchange of music with the following European groups:

The Artists' Society of Warsaw, the November Group of Berlin, the Composers' Guild of Prague and Vienna, the Moravian Society of Brunn, the Société Indépendante of Paris, the Composers' Society of London.

Heard in England.

Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas" was the centrepiece in the program of Oct. 20, with the "Shepherds of the Delectable Mountains" as a prelude and "All Fools' Day," a play by Miss T. M. Baretti, with music by Clive Carey, for the final piece. The music critic of The London Times remarked: "The peculiar charm of Purcell's opera, now happily becoming almost well known is its combination of a pure and classic style with details of extraordinarily vivid characterization. His witches are as superhuman as his sailors are human, while his Dido, from her decorous acceptance of her royal lover to her almost shrewish outburst of anger against him, followed by the poignant pathos of her death, is one of the great heroines of the operatic stage. The Bristol company has studied Purcell to good purpose, and it was delightful to witness a repetition of the excellent production with improvement given in the Victoria Rooms two years ago."

The Bristol company gave Stanford's "Traveling Companion" on the evening of Oct. 24. It was done by amateurs at Liverpool last year, but this was its first production on a regular operatic stage. Adrian Boult conducted. The critic of The London Times said: "The contrast created between the grave measure of the prelude, a measure which pervades all the music associated with the traveling companion himself and the lightly flung song of the girls with the refrain 'All In a Morning Ginry,' fixes at once the prevailing mood of the romance. Poet and composer see eye to eye, and verse and music move happily together."

The Blackpool Music Festival, which occurred in October, though adversely affected by the coal strike, attracted 1,650 entries, representing 8,000 individual competitors. Instrumentalists were in the lead. Twenty quartets and quintets offered themselves for competition in Beethoven's Quartet in F, Schumann's Quintet and Mozart's Quintet in E flat. The winning choir was composed of girls under 18 years of age.

Sir Landon Ronald, at a dinner given in his honor at the Cecil in October, referred to William, Boosey's announced intention to sell Queen's Hall to a cinema company, attributing the failure of concerts to wireless competition. Sir Landon repeated the assertion that he made before the Society of Musicians eighteen months ago that 90 per cent. of the concerts in London were financial failures, but not from that cause. He thought it ridiculous to say that the concerts given at the Albert Hall by the British Broadcasting Company had affected the attendance at other orchestral concerts. The B. B. C. concerts do not pay; they are given with the idea of providing listeners all over the British Isles with first-class orchestral music. Sir Landon considered the B. B. C. a boon to the musical profession. It gave the young artists a new field in which to exercise their talents and an opportunity to earn a little money. He thought that broadcasting added to the reputation of the artist.

An overflowing audience attended Donizetti's "Daughter of the Regiment" at the Old Vic, Oct. 24. The whole performance, said The London Times, "went to a running accompaniment of laughter and applause, a tribute as much to the credit of the players as to the capacity of the composer to produce the obvious musical equivalent of the modified gayety, and by no means modified sentiment of his librettist. For there are no half-measures in the conduct of this ingennous tale of the love of Mahry—her Gallic origin is put beyond question by the pronunciation at the Old Vic—for the peasant lad who, in the true vein of novelettish romance, rises to the command of the gallant Twentieth. Any abstruse points in the plot are thoughtfully made intelligible by the engaging way in which the characters come down to the footlights and enlighten us as to their past history and future intentions, while there is a corresponding frankness about the music they are given to singing. To Donizetti a tune was a tune, and he set down the good and the bad with strict impartiality. Chorus and orchestra, under Charles Corri, attacked both tunes and jingles with infinite zest, a quality in which they displayed a decided superiority over the corps de ballet."

Echoes From France.

The music which Claude Debussy wrote for "King Lear" was given its first public performance by the Pasdeloup Orchestra, under the direction of Albert Wolff, Oct. 28. When the theatre-director, M. Antoine, decided to produce "King Lear" at the Odéon, he asked Debussy to write the incidental music to Shakespeare's tragedy. The composer set to work, but found it impossible to finish the score in time. The important fragments which had already been written remained in their case until Madame Debussy a few weeks ago turned them over to M. Albert Wolff. M. Wolff began immediately to rehearse these pieces with the orchestra; they include a fanfare for brass and harps and a berceuse (sleep of King Lear) for strings, flutes and horn. Another novelty on the program was the "Fantaisie Contrapuntique," written by Lekeu in 1890 and now played for the first time. Albert Wolff also conducted the new version of Ravel's "Barque sur L'Ocean."

LOCAL CONCERT LIST VARIED—NOTES OF THE ART WORLD

PROGRAMS OF THE WEEK

Tuesday's Puccini Premiere Among Events On Musical Broadway

WITH the season's first new opera in final dress rehearsal today, the Metropolitan's scheduled performances will reach a total of nineteen different productions in the first three weeks, all but "Turandot" having been prepared before the theatre opened a fortnight ago.

Tonight's "opera concert" will have as its stars Mmes. Easton, Queena Mario, Telva and Wakefield, Messrs. Fullin, Tedesco and Basiola, and Mr. Bamboschek will conduct a program from Verdi and Mascagni.

Operas and casts for the week follow:

The Magic Flute, Monday evening.

Mmes. Talley, Rethberg, Fleischer, Telva, Flexer, Wells, Anthony, Hunter and Ryan; Messrs. Laubenthal, Whitehill, Bender, Schutzendorf, Meadar, Gabor, Gustafson and Bloch. Conductor, Bodansky.

Turandot; Puccini's posthumous opera (first time in the United States). Tuesday evening.

Mmes. Jeritza, Attwood (debut), Lerch and Flexer; Messrs. Lauri-Volpi, DeLuca, Ladislav (debut), Cehanovsky, Tedesco, Bada and Altglass. Conductor, Serafin.

Andrea Chenier, Wednesday evening.

Mmes. Easton, Alcock, Bourskaya and Anthony; Messrs. Gigli, Danise, Didur, Malatesta, Anantan, Bada, Cehanovsky, Raschillan, Picco, Gabor and Paltrinieri. Conductor, Serafin.

Faust, Thursday evening.

Mmes. Alda, Dalossy and Howard; Messrs. Martinelli, Pavlola, Rothier and Wolfe. Conductor, Hasselmans.

Lucia di Lammermoor, special Friday matinee.

Mmes. Talley and Egener, Messrs. Lauri-Volpi, DeLuca, Tedesco, Flaza and Paltrinieri. Conductor, Bellezza.

Lohengrin, Friday evening.

Mmes. Jeritza and Matzenauer; Messrs. Rasbach, Whitehill, Bender and Tibbett. Conductor, Bodansky.

La Gioconda, Saturday matinee.

Mmes. Fusello, Gordon and Alcock; Messrs. Gigli, Danise, Pinza, Malatesta, D'Angelo, Raschillan and Paltrinieri. Conductor, Serafin.

Cavalleria Rusticana and Pagliacci, Saturday evening.

The former with Mmes. Vettori (debut), Wakefield and Bourskaya; Messrs. Tokatyan and Basiola. The latter with Mmes. Mario, Messrs. Martinelli, Tibbett, Cehanovsky and Tedesco. Mr. Bellezza will conduct both operas.

WITH THE ORCHESTRAS

FIFTY men are assembling for New York's newest organization, the Paramount Orchestra, which will play in its namesake theatre announced to open Nov. 19 in Times Square. Nathaniel Finston, general music director for the new house, has appointed Irvin Talbot, formerly of the Rivoli, and Josef Koestner as conductors; Frederick Fradkin, concertmaster; Henry Falk and R. A. Barnett, librarians, and Jesse Crawford, organist.

Two scores of Serge Prokofieff will be performed by Serge Koussevitsky at the opening of the New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Nov. 25 and 27. There will be a suite from the ballet "Chout," announced then to be heard for the first time in New York in full orchestral performance, and a suite from the opera "The Love of Three Oranges."

The Philharmonic Orchestra will be out of town this week, playing Monday in Philadelphia, Tuesday in Washington and Wednesday in Baltimore. At next Sunday's Carnegie Hall concert, Wagenaar's overture to "The Taming of the Shrew" is promised for the "first time in America."

When Lewis Richards appears with the New York Symphony Orchestra on Nov. 26 in Carnegie Hall and Nov. 28 in Mecca Temple, he will play the harpsichord part in de Falla's "El Retablo," to be presented with puppets for the second and third times in New York.

The Friends of Music at the Town Hall next Sunday afternoon will present for the third time here Arthur Honegger's "Le Roi David."

Renée Chemet, who has returned to this country, will be a violin soloist at the Metropolitan Opera House concert next Sunday evening.

Nadia Reisenberg, pianiste, will open her season as soloist on Nov. 21 with the Detroit Symphony Orchestra.

Daniel Protheroe will direct the Associated Glee Club chorus of 2,500 voices in a concert at the Sesquicentennial in Philadelphia on Nov. 27.

Henri Deering, pianist, will appear with the St. Louis Symphony Orchestra in December on his way to the Pacific Coast.

VARIOUS MUSIC EVENTS.

Nahan Franko this afternoon leads the first of five "young people's concerts" at Temple Israel Community Center, 210 West Ninety-first Street.

Sigmund Spaeth will direct two "Old Song Week" musicales at Wanamaker's tomorrow and Tuesday afternoons with popular choral singing.

Alfred Greer, tenor, will sing on Tuesday evening at Chickering Hall.

Mme. Bedikian gives a soprano song recital at Steinway Hall on Saturday evening.

The Freiheit Singing Society will appear on Saturday evening at Carnegie Hall.

David and Clara Mannes are to give "all the Beethoven sonatas" for violin and piano in Sunday recitals starting Dec. 5.

FRENCH STARS REHEARSE

Foreign and Local Casts Preparing for Light Opera Revivals

FORMAL announcement is made of the recent arrival in New York, aboard the liner Paris, of a company of artists who will open the season of the French-American Opera Comique. With the newcomers is Thomas Salignac, remembered as tenor formerly at the Metropolitan and now artistic director of a new enterprise that should be of interest and importance to the local musical world. A complete American alternate company is also engaged for classic light opera revivals, beginning a week hence, in both English and French.

Some of the stars of the foreign division are Marcelle Evrard, a leading coloratura soprano of the Opéra Comique in Paris; Jenny Syril of the Apollo Theatre there; Sonia Ainy of the Trianon-Lyrique; Suzanne Langier of the Grand Casino, Vichy; André Moreau of the Trianon-Lyrique, Georges Foix, "tenor leger," of the Opéra Comique; M. Hiragaray, baritone, of the Gaîté-Lyrique; M. Servatius, leading comedian of the Théâtre des Celestins, Lyons, and Julien Clemandh, a conductor from the Gaîté-Lyrique, Paris.

If French opera in New York has suffered from the lack of French artists to interpret it, the promised presentations here by the distinguished foreigners, to the manner born, may bring a change in that regard. Both local and forsign committees of social sponsors have joined in assuring the public of "just as homogeneous treatment of the beautiful and interesting French operas as they have been accustomed to in German or Italian works at the Metropolitan."

The opening revival, "Girofle-Girofla," will go into rehearsal immediately in various halls for the opening on Nov. 22 at the Joison Theatre,

FREE TO THE PUBLIC.

The Arthur Hartmann string quartet will play Mozart's quartet in G, Opus 12, and Grieg's quartet, Opus 27, on Wednesday evening in the Lewisohn free chamber concerts at Hunter College. Professor H. T. Fleck will speak on Mozart.

In Samuel Baldwin's free organ program at the City College today are Bach's toccata in F and Chopin's nocturne in G minor. Wednesday's list includes the allegro from Schnbert's Unfinished Symphony and a finale from the First Symphony of Vierne.

Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" will be sung by Clarence Dickinson's choir at the Brick Church at 4 o'clock this afternoon.

BROOKLYN MUSIC.

The New York Symphony Orchestra opens a series of six concerts at the Brooklyn Academy next Saturday afternoon with its performance of Act 1 from Wagner's "Die Walküre," with Elsa Alsen, Rudolf Laubenthal and Fred Patton.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins its Brooklyn visits on Friday, Nov. 26.

The Hartmann string quartet plays at the Academy next Sunday.

OTHERS TO BE HEARD.

Puccini's "Turandot" is the theme of Charlotte Lund's second opera recital this evening at the Princess Theatre.

Lucrezia Bori, Harold Van Duser and the Mendelssohn Quartet open Mr. Segurola's "artistic mornings" on Thursday at the Hotel Plaza.

Rosa Low, Reinald Werrenrath and Eddy Brown will appear at the second of the Biltmore morning musicales next Friday.

Ester Dale and Ossip Gabrilowitsch on Saturday afternoon will give the third program in the Hotel Roosevelt recitals.

A "Turandot" lecture recital is announced for Nov. 23 at the Plaza by Blanche Levy and Elinor Lambert.

"Lohengrin" is the second Wagner recital by Mrs. E. F. Goldman and Ralph Leopold at the Majestic on Tuesday.

MAJORS AND MINORS.

The Heckscher Foundation Orchestra, under Isidor Strassner, opens its series Saturday afternoon at the Children's Theatre, 1 East 104th Street.

F. Henry Tschudi is giving an organ recital Tuesday evening at the New York Institute for Education of the Blind, on Pelham Parkway. Assisting are Walter Renkwitz, violin, and Bassett Hough.

The Southern Woman's Educational Alliance will have for its third annual benefit matinee, on Thursday, Dec. 2, at the Metropolitan, a performance of "The Jewels of the Madonna" with Jeritza.

Mary Lewis, of the opera, is announced in a Sunday afternoon song recital on Dec. 12 at Carnegie Hall.

"Seventy Negro Spirituals," edited by William Arms Fisher, and "Epochs in Musical Progress," by Clarence G. Hamilton, are published by the Oliver Ditson Company this Fall.

ACTIVITIES OF MUSICIANS.

With Josef Hofmann on his return from Europe rscently were two young musicians also bound for Philadelphia. The elder was Abram Chasins, the 24-year-old composer, whose works already are becoming known and are included this year on Hofmann's concert program. Chasins will join the faculty of the Curtis Institute as an instructor in piano, while continuing to study and compose under the guidance of Mr. Hofmann. Their younger companion, of the name of Casini, a 13-year-old lad of Italian and Russian parentage, was brought to America at the request of the boy's uncle, Benno Moiseivitsch, who will himself instruct his nephew in piano.

The Walter W. Naumburg Musical Foundation will present three young artists in New York dehnt recitals this season. They are Margaret Hamilton of Ohio and Sonia Skaika of Boston, pianists, and Phyllis Kraeuter, 'cellist of the Marianna Kneisel Quartet nf thie city. These artists were selected from a large number of applicants by a jury consisting of Alexander Lambert, Benno Moiseivitsch and Mischa Elman, after preliminary auditions conducted by the National Music League.

The Master Instituts of United Arts in this city has awarded scholarships in piano to Louise Curcio of Newark and Leontine Hirsch nf New York, both hlind students who showed unusual gifts.

Shumsky Mario has announced voice trials for stndents for npera and operetta at his stndio in the Metropolitan Opera building.

Emanuele Stieri in Steinway Hall has held anditions recently for four scholarships for young singers.

The Malkin Conservatory of Music has marked the inauguration of a fifteenth season at its new headquarters, 381 West End Avenue.

METROPOLITAN REHEARSALS.

Some idea may be had as to the rehearsal work involved in producing the recent revival by Mr. Gatti-Casazza at the Metropolitan Opera Hnuse of Mozart's fantastic opera, "The Magic Flute," from these data: Apart from the numerous rehearsals of the chorus by Chorus Master Giulio Setti, there were no fewer than ninety-five private individual musical rehearsals in their several parts (hy conductors and assistant conductors) of artists as follows:

Talley 5, Rethberg 2, Fleischer 5, Wells 10, Telva 7, Ryan 7, Anthony 8, Flexer 5, Laubenthal 2, Whitehill 3, Gabor 4, Schntzandorf 2, Hunter 2, Meader 3, Bloch 4, Gustafson 5, Dalossy 9, Easton 2, Bender 1.

Next there were sixty-one individual rehearsals nn the roof stage in stage action by Stage Manager Samuel Thewman as follows:

Bender 3, Talley 3, Rethberg 3, Fleischer 4, Wells 5, Telva 4, Ryan 4, Anthony 4, Flexer 4, Laubenthal 2, Whitehill 2, Gabor 4, Schutzendorf 3, Hunter 4, Meader 2, Bloch 2, Gustafson 3, Easton 2, Dalossy 3.

Next followed three general rehearsals on the regular stage with piano, everybody in the cast participating, Mr. Bodanzky directing.

After them came three general rehearsals with orchestra led by Mr. Bodanzky—who also had three rehearsals with the orchestra alone, followed by two more general stage rehearsals with piano, and three more with orchestra.

In addition there were five what are known as "light rehearsals," in order to get the scenic effects called for. It will thus be seen that upon the revival every care of preparation was bestowed.

FURTHER MUSICAL MENTION.

From the proceeds of the Metropolitan's first benefit matinee, when Marion Talley sang recently in "Rigoletto" for the National Opera Clnb, it was announced that a prize of $1,000 would be awarded in a contest of the National Federation of Music Clubs for a young woman singer, "with the promise of an audition at the Metropolitan and an appearance with the San Carlo Opera Company."

Mrs. Sherman Post Haight, Chairman of the Hospital Music Committee for the New York City Visiting Nnrses Association, has arranged with Ernest Schelling, the pianist, to perform at the 700th free concert to be given hy this committee at the City Hospital, Welfare Island, on Tuesday next. Mr. Schelling will be assisted hy Ruth Kenworthy, singer and accompanist, and Ben Levitzky, violin.

Mario Chamlee, assisted by Rnth Miller Chamlee, gave a concert in the newly finished $1,250,000 Auditorium at San Antonio, Texas. They concluded the program with the Saint Sulpice scene from Massenet's "Manon," in costume and with a full organ accompaniment. They gave a similar performance two days later before an audience of 5,000 at the Anditorinm in Denver.

MUSIC IN FRANCE

THEODORE LINDENLAUB, in le Temps, views the musical outlook in Paris and abroad. He is of the opinion that Germany is in a musical decline, and that 'here seems a possibility of a Latin musical alliance. He comments on a situation steadily becoming worse. The French Government, out of its bndget of forty milliards of francs, gives only a meagre dole to symphonic societies. Paris is interested only in expensive projects. "In all these years, Paris has not yet contrived to build herself a real concert hall. For the first time, Germany seems ill at ease. She has only just realized that the musical vein which astonished the world for two centuries is exhansted. After 'Parsifal' came a silence. The century which began with the creation of the 'Eroïca' (1804), ended with a religious masterpiece. Bayreuth for two generations remained the temple of a new cult. Musical life in Germany is still more difficult than in France. It is not so much a question of money, as of sterility.

"The extraordinary chain of geniuses which began with Bach (1685) and ended with Wagner (1883), persuaded the Germans that music would for ever be German. With Liszt, Brahms and Strauss, the thread seems to have broken. German composers have no definite aim. Paul Hindemith is the best known of the musicians of the new generation, and he approximates the French musicians—Milhaud, Honegger, Auric and Poulenc. Hindemith's concerto for orchestra, which Serge Koussevitzky directed in Paris last Spring, has no originality and makes use of the rhythms common to all modern reactionaries. Their daring innovations consist in coupling the forms of Bach, or Rameau, with the most recent Afro-American rhythms. These attempts in Germany have been bewildering in their rapid changes. No conclusions can he drawn from contradictory compositions which are neither original nor clear. To us, the musical future of Germany remains ambiguous. Neither can anything be inferred from the fact that the Philharmonic Society of Berlin, directed by Furtwängler, revived the César Franck symphony at its first concert.

"The concert programs of last year were full nf Brazilian, Argentinian, North - American - Negro numbers. This imported element has left no trace in recent German symphonic works. The revival of music in Germany remains a problem; no one knows what will be written on the blank page, nor who will write on it.

"The young Italian school has made itself an enviable and legitimate place in Europe. Italian success was formerly reserved for the theatre composer. The young Italians have the more difficult ambition of writing symphonies, orchestral poeme and chamber music. Malipiero, Pizzetti and Respighi have certain traits in common; they disdain facile effects and prolixity. Among all the musicians of the younger Enropean generation, the Italians, and a few chosen English, will be the first to produce something striking. Both of them show a disposition to turn from Germanic influences. The English are drawing from the inexhaustible resources of their nation.: songs. They are interested in music of all countries, France, Russia, Spain, &c.; but it is within herself that England seeks her renaissance. • • •

"The season opened in Italy, as it did in Paris, under the auspices of Beethoven. In these uncertain times the Beethoven commemorations are a godsend to concert directors. The centenary of Beethoven will save an otherwise arid season. On the shoulders of this giant, music will be able to pass through the Winter months, while awaiting new works and better conditions. The French, Spanish and Italian schools, the most living today, seem on the point of realizing a Latin union."

The difficult situation of musicians in France is again causing concern among their well-wishers. Le Guide du Concert has started an inquiry with the object of drawing the attention of the public to the difficulties besetting artists, and of finding a remedy for a crisis which may compromise the future of French art. Answers from several musicians have been received. M. A. Mariotte said: "Before the war young musicians knew that they were entering a precarious profession where fame was capricious and success uncertain. They armed themselves with philosophy, faith and patience. The younger generation of today, excited by a mechanical age, desires success and money immediately. There seems no remedy for this attitude; all the old guard can do is to take refuge in a dignified silence."

Swan Hennessy wrote: "The situation of the composer has not changed. It is the same today that it was yesterday. Music is an art and not a trade. Art is a spiritual thing, and those who have the gift profit less from it than their exploiters. The composer might work at other things, but inspiration is not a handy tool, like a carpenter's hammer."

Rhené-Baton commented on the indifference of the Paris public: "There are more than 4,000,000 inhabitants in Paris, and only about 8,000 or 10,000 of them go to concerts. That is the real cause of the crisis. I see no reason why composers should not have a secondary musical occupation. Mendelssohn and Wagner directed orchestras, Schumann was a critic, Brahms a choral director, Bach a cantor. How many musicians have divided their time between composing and teaching! César Franck was a case in point."

Albert Berthelin said: "The situation which we deplore has been in existence a long time. Since the days of Gounod and Messager the number of composers who could live hy their art has diminished. Many of Gounod's contemporaries, those who cultivated symphonic music, made a ridiculous income. César Franck had to drudge all his life at giving lessons to earn his daily bread. Even this last resource is failing today. Music, like all the arts, is merely an entertainment to amateurs; it is not even considered in their budget. If teachers try to raise the prices of their lessons to meet the cost of living the number of their pupils diminish with their income. It is possible that composers might protect their interests by forming a cooperation, hut artists are jealous of their independence. The public, whose burdens are increasing, is not interested in the music question."

The Society of Swiss Musicians celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary in October. It has given twenty-five festivals, at which the works of native composers were prominently featured. There are probahly more orchestras in Switzerland than in any other area of the same size. Zürich, Bâle, Berne, St. Gall, Winterthur, Geneva, Lausanne, Neufchatel, all have their symphonic orchestras. The musicians are Swiss, Germans, Belgians, French, Italians. The most noted of the conductors are Ansermet, Suter, and Brun. These orchestras also give concerts in towns less fortunately situated. In the smaller centres, gronps of amateurs give recitals of high merit. The theatres of Zürich, Bâle, Berne and Geneva offer an excellent operatic repertory, with the assistance of foreign artists.

ART NOTES OF THE WEEK

John Marin's Water Colors as Music—Work By Mme. Kovacs, Rowlandson and Others

AN elemental music sings through the recent water colors by John Marin, now on view at Alfred Stieglitz's Intimate Gallery (Room 303, Anderson Galleries). Marin's water colors, in fact, give prophetic point to Walter Pater's so logical contention that all the arts aspire to the condition of music. Only Marin's water colors do not aspire, they are music.

Schopenhauer might have been thinking of Marin when, defining music, he wrote that the creative musician reveals the innermost essential being of the world and expresses the highest wisdom in a language his reason does not understand. For reason does not deform Marin's water colors into slick representations of a recognizable world. Though the world is in them—soaring fingers of metal and stone, tragic three-masters and lusty seas, dancing suns and leaping trees—it is a world singing, affirming life through John Marin, her water colorist. Marin expresses his joy in life with great joyous lunges and thrusts.

With his dazzlingly limpid wash and his thunderbolts of elemental color, hot and cold echoes of nature's prism, Marin captures the music of things, imprisoning it in a childlike line. He paints not the thing he sees but its music, its counterpoint to the music of other things. The fragility of small, windblown white ships undaunted by raging, gray, mountainous waves; the wet, fragrant odors of salty springs on sparkling Maine islands; the frenzy of storms savagely furrowing the blue bays in which these islands sail; the flight of disappearing cubes that rocket to the sky in a mad race to reach the sun; the flowing songs of a radiant Hudson; a cool sun glad to be alive in Suffern, N. Y.; the live stabs of unparalleled greens, reds, hues, pinks and yellows produced by Marin's creatively juggling sun and Palisades; the innocent songs of green seas groaning with ecstasy in their earthrending struggles with wind and sky and man—of these essences is Marin's music composed.

Other artists have seen the surfaces of New York; hut Marin sees New York itself, rearing monstrous pointed heads into a smiling sky; straining and growing and roaring; fed by bridges that chain her to an overshadowed world; anchored in a cold bay, itself entangled by steaming, conceited gnats, which are tugs and openmouthed ferries—the mechanical, swirling, vihrant life of the city. Other artists have seen the Hudson and its Palisades, but Marin sees these with music. And when Marin is, as the music critics say, in good voice, his is the freshest water color voice in the land.—Until Dec. 1.

BIG, sweet nudes, asleep and posing, predominate in the exhibitions of the paintings by Olga Szekely-Kovacs at the Anderson Galleries. Bnt though the figures in Mme. Kovacs's paintings are large, they are not heavy. It is as if the painter had taken the contours of the paintings by Courbet, beaten them up like eggs in a howl of Hungarian sentiment, added romantic sweetness and had spread the results a little too generously on large canvases. It is curious that so traditionally gifted an artist should cover up her strength with a dull glaze of sweetness and light. In some instances, however, Mme. Kovacs is worsted hy her own strength, and it is for this reason that her exhibition is an interesting and promising affair.—Until Nov. 27.

PORTRAITS by Robert W. Chanler at the Whitney Studio Club are spicy bits of biography and autobiography. Mr. Chanler is not a union painter—which is to say that he does not observe academic rules in making his likenesses. His portraits are personal slants on those likenesses, and down those slants slide his pertinent impressions.

Thus, one is afforded a portrait of the sitter and of the artist. The results are sometimes quite juicy, and even more interesting as gossip than as painting. Consequently, the "Ivor from "Richard Le Gallienne," the poet, to "Miss O'Wala, Dancer," is not so great as it would seem, even though Mr. Le Gallienne is a citizen of Parnassus and Miss O'Wala is a tawdry queen of the burlesque stage.—Until Nov. 22.

THERE is a superb exhibition of original drawings by Thomas Rowlandson at the Ackermann Galleries. In the present collection the Rowlandson whose Rabelaisian humors and distempers could make blue noses biner is not exhibited so much as is the artist who made the prosaic phases nf life in the late eighteenth century fascinating and fascinating phases contagious. His genius for satire and caricature and just boyish good spirits lurks in the sketches of the "Interior of a French Barrack" and "Gallery of the Opera," and his grim humor sharpens "The Debtors' Collecting Box" with the hideously anguished faces of the prisoners staring through the prison bars while gay ladies drop coins in as they pass.—Until Dec. 1.

SYLPHS and nymphs at play, Summer, Autumn and Winter, in Central Park and in other favorite spots, are what Louis Eilshemius seems to enjoy painting most, judging by his exhibition at the Valentine Dndensing Galleries. Mr. Eilshemius does not seem to mind that his nudes are a little stiff and without grace. The only conclusion one can draw is that he likes them that way. The painting of them seems to be almost incidental. There is a certain interest in his "Flying Dutchman" and "Venus in Como." The one virtue (many will find it vicious) of Mr. Eilshemius's painting is an unbelievable naïveté. Certainly no one else paints like Mr. Eilshemius.—Until Nov. 27. L. K.

Modern Italian Artists at Whitney Studio—Claude Monet

By ELISABETH L. CARY.

OPENING this week at the Whitney Studio is an exhibition of prints and drawings by contemporary Italian artists. The collection has been assembled by the Italian Department of Fine Arts, under the personal supervision of Gr. Uff. Arduino Colasanti, with the purpose of again showing the American people "the work of contemporary Italian artists who have attained distinction in a field of artistic endeavor in which Italy has old and glorious traditions." While it cannot compare in interest with the collection of paintings by the modern Italians exhibited here last year, it has a considerable scope and indicates the general tendency of graphic art in Italy today.

The exhibition later on is to be sent on tour to the principal cities of the United States, under the auspices of the Italy-America Society. It is said to be the first exhibition of its kind to have been sent to America from Italy and the most complete ever assembled by the Italian Government. The most notable artists on the list, however, were included in the Italian exhibition of last January and their work comes to us this time with at least a hint of familiarity, the strong individuality behind each example having impressed itself upon the minds of an attentive public.

Altogether the most original mind in the group is that of Adolfo Wildt, who constantly is spoken of as one of the younger school, but who was born in Milan in 1868 and has achieved fame as a sculptor of extraordinary skill and virtuosity. In his drawings he develops a more primitive style than in his sculpture, without, however, conveying the slightest impression of personal naïveté. Bands of pale brown with occasionally accents of gold are used in considered relations to emphasize a flatness in the design and a mural quality that makes it easy to think of these small decorative pages as expanded to cover large panels of a wall without losing their linear expressiveness or stretching the open spaces beyond significance. The most beautiful of these drawings, all unfailing in their beauty, is "L'Adro d'Anime" with its fervent sweep and small passionate detail, a union of splendor and humility. The religious themes are presented with a similar union of unlike qualities, intensity of emotion with a calm and measured dignity of expression. A "Descent From the Cross" is peopled with mourners whose features are ravaged by grief, yet the effect of the quiet composition, the foreground dotted with little flowers in pots, the figures slightly rigid in their disarray, is that of a peaceful art, agitated by no accelerated rhythms, no breaking up of the design into disturbing subdivisions. In this way the poignant drama of the tragedy gains force through contrast.

Wildt's symbolism is not wholly proof against a tendency to melodrama, however. The design in which two skeletons with crowns on their heads grin backward at a maiden falling from the planet earth, her hair sweeping behind her in a star-strewn veil, barely escapes commonplace in its crude approach to horror.

No Traffic With Symbolism.

Anatonio Carbonati, a young man of 33, who lives in Rome and who has studied under Ettore Tito and Aristide Sartorio, makes no traffic with symbolism. His powerful etchings of city streets and buildings relieve the solemn architecture with cheerful incidents of street life in ceaseless activity. Dogs, beggars, gossips, little accidents of tripping over an umbrella, of being upset by a vagrant puppy, open carriages drawn by horses, men on bicycles, countless detail, yet all of it ruggedly indicated.

A brilliant example of the young school is seen in the young Roman, Romano Dazzi, whose imaginative drawings of figures in motion, made when he was only 4 years old, started him on the career of a prodigy. His big drawing of a man on a camel bearing a banner is a bold and handsome affair for a youngster of 20, but that is all it is. Later, no doubt, there will be either more depth or more subtlety or both under the tough skin of his indisputable talent. Others are Enrico Arcioni, Pieriuigi Bartolucci, Settimo Bocconi, Pier Giulio Breschi, Adolfo Carolis, Eduardo del Neri, Laurenzo Lanrenzi, Angelo Rossini, Carlo Alberto Petrucci and Alfredo Petrucci, all of Rome; Alfredo Petrucci showing in addition to some fine drawings a very beautiful engraved head of Leopardi, almost aggressive in its bold attack upon the deeply modeled features, yet softened by the eternal mildness of Italian art in whatever field it is found. Augusto Baracchi, Benito Boccalari, Ubaldo Magnavacco are from Modena. Guida Marussig is from Wildt's city, Milan, and contributes an art at the opposite pole from that of Wildt.

Giovanni Guerrini, from Ravenna, is most interesting in a richly complicated design of lute players on a wall serenading the moon, which shines with cool beneficence, carving out the delicate detail of foliage, architectural ornament, distant hill town and winding road. Arturo Checci is fortunate in the subtle humor of his animal subjects. There are many others, the exhibition including in all 331 items. It gives the impression of a flexible, richly endowed group, who work easily and lavishly, tilling their own ground, showing little foreign influence and perpetuating many of the familiar traditions of the famous Italian past with less energy than was shown by their great forerunners.

Although a disturbing rumor of his serious illness was circulated earlier in the season it is denied in reports from Paris, and he is said to be in good health and painting on his mural decoration for the Orangerie in the Jardin des Tuileries. Since reading in the chapter given to him in the book by Florent Fels published last year that he came to greet his visitor, carefully avoiding the obstacles in his path with a hesitating step, peering through huge spectacles and admitting that to see details he must wait until from time to time they grow out of the fog constantly before his eyes, it is difficult to think of him in his ardent and vigorous youth.

For many years we have almost forgotten his youth in admiration of his analyses of light and color. His name, like that of Corot or Reynolds or Rembrandt, has a public significance dissociated from the quality or character of his work. It is a "household word" among those whose households boast any familiarity with the outlines of art history. He stands for one of the most important movements in that history, one which brought into art the light of the world, the color and the light shining in darkness of a world that had been explored only in part by the forerunners of the Impressionists.

Every one now knows how he watched the sun in its daily advance, interrogated the effect of its rays upon colored surfaces, realized the subtle movement of the atmosphere and the shift from moment to moment in the aspect of the landscape played upon by sunlight. We all know how he changed the face of landscape painting with his syntheses of these fugitive moments. What most of us have forgotten is the result of the arduous drill he went through to learn to draw. His early paintings prove him a draftsman and designer of ability far beyond the ordinary. In The New York Times Magazine today "Le Dejeuner" is reproduced, a picture painted in 1875, clear and definite in characterization, a charming version of family life, with substantial forms, surfaces and textures closely observed and differentiated, every detail eloquent of careful training in the manner of the academies. The training had been hard, and sharp the conquering. Although Monet wrote to his friend Boudin when he was 16 that he was "steadily drawing the figure—a famous idea," he was still thought incapable by Troyon three years later and advised by the older artist "to give yet more study to the figure, to draw nothing but the figure until he had mastered it." And master it he did. Then he was free.

DRAWINGS SEEN

Aubrey Beardsley's Work Now on Exhibition Is Spirited

AT the Anderson Galleries the John Lane collection of original drawings by Aubrey Beardsley is on view until the evening of Nov. 22, when it will be sold by auction. The collection includes Juvenilia, drawings for amateur entertainments, programs for gay childish theatricals held at the Beardsley home in Cambridge Street, and interesting chiefly as souvenirs of boyish holidays. They come to an end in the year Beardsley was sixteen.

Six years later the "Yellow Book" was started in collaboration with Henry Harland, and with it came the remarkable series of long and slender ladies, of foregrounds and backgrounds sprayed with roses and little garden flowers, of garments each the apotheosis of some ordinary fashion of dress, caught up and pranced through a magical transformation. Superb blacks cut with rapier strokes of white. A firm and spirited line, a distinct and personal type sinister and worn, with curled lips. A power to create intricate rhythms while hardly suggesting motion. If Beardsley were indeed indebted to the Japanese print makers and the Greek vase painters the very essence of their quality escaped him. With his eyes upon the carousing revelers of Euphronios or Duris, upon strong-limbed Amazons and long Athenian ladies in draperies of multiplied folds, he saw all except the vital force to which two thousand years are but as a moment. Neither Greek nor Japanese, however, could surpass this consumptive genius in tact and daintiness of ornament.

Thirty-three years ago Joseph Pennell wrote an article on Aubrey Beardsley for The Studio. Beardsley was only 21 years old and the work he had shown is now called that of his adolescence. He lived, however, but five years longer, and, like many others destined by the fatal love of the gods to die young, he covered in the few years allotted to him the span of genius from uncertain sensitive beginnings to ripe achievement. Pennell wrote: "The little headpieces, notably one of men in armor, seem to me in execution as well as design, quite equal to the best fifteenth century work. Then, too, his little landscapes are altogether delightful; though they are conventional in the right sense, they are not imitations. But most interesting of all is his use of the single line, with which he weaves his drawings into a harmonious whole, joining extremes and reconciling what might be oppositions—leading but not forcing you properly to regard the concentration of his motive. In his blacks, too, he has obtained a singularly interesting quality, and always disposes them so as to make a very perfect arabesque." So much extravagant and highly colored language has been spent upon Beardsley's audacious and aristocratic art that one may use, perhaps, excessive pleasure in these plain words of a fellow-artist who praised him without purple and found in him the characteristics that appeal to artists apart from those that still excite the sensibilities to a pathological admiration.

Magic of Black and White.

His feminine type, personal as it was, Mr. Pennell also noted, was English enough and often to be found, the features pressed into the Beardsley mold, but easily recognizable. After one has submitted to the sheer magic of the black and white the unused poster for the Yellow Book (No. 19 of the catalogue), lingered at the beauty of the strong delicate line in the horned bat and the buoyant ripple of the pointed trimming on the flared coat, it is amusing to note how England, his England, had him, after all excursioning, in the hollow of her hand. The lithe figure in its tight-waisted costume with the dragging white skirt, the great black hun of the hair, the little imp held on the outstretched palm in Greenaway garb beneath the brilliant design, are seen to be London signed by Japan. What is the "Venus" of the suppressed titlepage, with her massive plume, but the little cockney "duchess" of "Pygmalion"?

Upon rare occasions, so rare as to attract immediate notice, the exotic Beardsley flung his domino of eclecticism off and became openly and charmingly a very simple if intellectually exalted young Englishman. In the present collection such two occasions occur in the series "Pierrot's Library." One design shows Pierrot on a stepladder, reaching down a large book from the top shelf of the library. A bold outline drawing without ornament, symbolism or grotesque. The other design is Pierrot's walk with his friend across the fields, a pleasant path with wild flowers and weeds bordering it, a rude fence, rolling ground in the distance, trees and a church steeple at the horizon, the lines of a telegraph pole crossing the sky, flying birds. The pedestrians in Pierrot ruffs and sabots clumping along, one erect, the other slouching. Something of French in it, of course, but no Frenchman could have achieved such naturalness without introducing a consciously artless element.

PENNELL'S MATURE WORK

FOLLOWING the very large if not exhaustive exhibition of the work of Joseph Pennell at Philadelphia, the more restricted memorial at the Metropolitan Museum wears an aspect of full maturity. Although one finds here and there an adventure of the earlier years, the four rooms for the most part bear testimony to the ripe fruition of an abundant talent. The exhibition lasts until Jan. 2 and the detailed notice must be deferred until time and space agree.

OUTSTANDING EVENTS IN THE LONDON REALM OF ART

By P. G. KONODY.

LONDON.

Another Epstein Skirmish — Pictures by Henri Rousseau, Hiler, Williams-Lyouns

JACOB EPSTEIN, whose fate it is to be unable to escape the kind of undesirable publicity that has more to do with a man than, strictly speaking, with a man's art, has scored in his recent encounter with Lord Wavertree.

Lord Wavertree took it upon himself, when opening the Autumn exhibition of the Walker Art Gallery in Liverpool, to criticize Mr. Epstein's specially invited exhibits.

Mr. Epstein took the only possible dignified course by informing the committee that, in the circumstances, he wished to withdraw his exhibits. The committee, setting aside the unauthorized action of its Vice Chairman, Lord Wavertree, requested the artist to reconsider his decision; and Mr. Epstein agreed to leave his busts on view.

ONE wonders what Lord Wavertree would have to say about the exhibition of paintings by Henri Rousseau, now at the Lefèvre Gallery. In the case of this untrained amateur with a passion for painting which he could only satisfy in his Sunday leisure hours, there would be some justification for a charge of incompetence. Rousseau, indeed, at his best was far below the worst that could be perpetrated by an Academy-taught artist of mediocre talent. He drew like a child. He had no technique. But he happened to be a born artist.

His ignorance of the centuries of European artistic culture and tradition and his innate genius for pictorial organization, for rhythmic arrangement, for evolving harmony from the juxtaposition of colors (often crude and harsh in themselves), his feeling for the balanced disposition of masses made him discover for himself, by dint of sheer sincerity and child-like faith in his rightness, those basic principles of art, the knowledge of which comes to the sophisticated professional painter only when he has discovered that the pursuit of realistic representation has landed him in a blind alley and that a work of art is not to be judged by its verisimilitude to Nature—that the laws of art are altogether different from the laws of Nature.

Many are the instances of highly accomplished modern artists making a bonfire of their laboriously accumulated efficiency in representational "correctness" and deliberately trying to acquire the naïve vision of a child. Rousseau had no such burden to shake off. In art he had never grown beyond the stage of childhood; and therein lies much of the fascination of his pictures, which come to London as a complete novelty.

Whether critical judgment in London will endorse the opinion of those French and German enthusiasts who acclaim the douanier as the greatest artist of the present century, remains to be seen. That he does not lack admirers in this country is evidenced by the fact that practically all the pictures were sold soon after the opening of the exhibition, though the prices demanded for them reach fantastic figures—$16,000 being the present valuation of a painting for which it would have been difficult to obtain $10 before the world had ceased to regard Rousseau's Sunday efforts as a joke.

THE art of the young American, Hiler Harzburg, who chooses to be known as "Hiler" and who has recently held an exhibition at the Dover Gallery, in some way recalls the naïveté of Rousseau. Technically it holds traces of kinship with Van Gogh. But these similarities are only superficial, for neither the brutality of Van Gogh's hatchet strokes nor the childishness of Rousseau's manner were assumed. Hiler makes one suspect that his "bad drawing" and careless brushwork conceal a thoroughly competent and well-trained craftsman who could, were he so minded, hold his own with any follower of the academic tradition.

Hiler lives in Paris, where he finds the subjects for his witty and stimulating pictorial comments on a variety of phases of urban life. The writer of the catalogue preface likens Hiler to Breughel. But Breughel is a master whose paintings were, above all, distinguished by a rich, luscious quality of pigment, whereas this quality is wholly lacking in Hiler's work. What Hiler has in common with the Flemish master is a broad rather than subtle sense of humor; and he, too, looks with sympathetic interest at life—the life of the café, cabaret, bar, shop and market, in his case, and not the peasant life that absorbed Breughel's attention.

IF Hiler belongs to the formidable number of American artists who owe both their technique and their outlook to study in a Paris atelier, H. F. Williame-Lyouns stands practically alone as an English painter trained in the United States. He studied in Boston under Professor George Bartlett and devoted the best of his energy to wood engraving, in which craft he emulated the fine achievements of Timothy Cole. His exhibition at the Faculty of Arts Gallery unfortunately includes but few examples of his wood engravings; but it reveals a dual personality as a painter.

There is the Impressionist landscape painter, ever busy with creating lively, sparkling, crisp and sunny records of many places visited in the course of travels—Venice, the Red Sea Chile, Mexico, Brittany, the South Sea, Japan, India, &c. And then there is the rather colorless and hazy dreamer of Miltonesque dreams, vainly struggling to find adequate expression for imaginative themes to which only heaven-born genius could do justice.

Still, there is merit even in his paintings of Lucifer-Satan, of the Inferno and of the Celestial regions, though their interest is more on the literary than on the esthetic side. His real métier is emphatically landscape and seascape painting.

JAPAN AS TOYMAKER

JAPAN has become the third largest toy-producing country, having, since the World War, increased its output 1,000 per cent. It is difficult to recognize toys of Japanese make, for they are usually clever imitations of American or German products. Although Japan exports hand-made toys, it undersells the output of countries using machinery. The reason is that toy-making in Japan is largely done by women and children at home. Such labor is cheap.

Metal soldiers in every country's uniform compose a large part of the toy exports of Japan. The more ingenious mechanical toys are usually designed in America or Germany, but the Japanese imitate these, too. They manage to undersell American manufacturers, especially in electrically and spring operated toys.

DAUGHERTY TOWN'S FAME BEGAN WITH THE W. C. T. U.

Powerful Temperance Society Grew from Women's Crusade Against Saloons In Washington Court House, Ohio

THE little town of Washington Court House, Ohio, made nationally known through the recent Daugherty trial, was once before in the limelight. Fifty-three years ago The New York Tribune, The Cincinnati Commercial and other papers sent special correspondents there, and throughout the country was spread the news of an unheard of kind of temperance campaign. The direct result was the foundation of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. The indirect results were many, among them without doubt a contribution to the passage of the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution.

In 1873 some 3,000 people made their homes in the village that sprawled along the little stream known as Paint Creek. It was named for the first President and was the seat of a county named for Lafayette. It had its schools of the advanced Ohio type, its churches and modest homes; its dusty streets and open gutters; its "music hall," the sole place of entertainment; its Court Street and its Main Street; its "stock sale" day and its county fair; an unambitious hotel or two and a half dozen churches—and, what is immediately to the point, eight saloons, with three drug stores on their flank, all selling intoxicating liquors without let or hindrance. The licensing of the sale of liquor was forbidden by the Ohio Constitution of those days, and the only test of the right to sell was the certificate showing the payment of the Federal excise tax.

On the evening of Dec. 24, 1873, Dr. Dio Lewis of Boston, an authority on dietetics and a lecturer on many topics, was scheduled to talk at Washington Court House on "Our Girls." Dr. Lewis had a little habit of injecting into every lecture, on whatever subject, a suggestion of temperance, with a sketch of his plan for fighting the saloon. His biography, published in 1891, states that he saw the women of Clarksville, N. Y., in the 1840's clean that village of the liquor traffic by prayer, by mass visitation and entreaty. In 1858 he stirred the women of Dixon, Ill., and Battle Creek, Mich., to like, even if temporary, success. For the next fifteen years he advocated this plan whenever and wherever he lectured. In December, 1873, in Fredonia and Jamestown, N. Y., and in Hillsboro, Ohio, he started the women to enthusiastic exertions.

Visit to Washington Court House.

And then he struck Washington Court House, the last place at which he presented his novel plan of campaign. After his appearance there further presentation became unnecessary; the movement grew of its own accord and the "Union" of the women spread through the civilized world.

The methods of the "Women's Crusade" at Washington Court House were picturesque. A meeting on Christmas morning was followed by a mass meeting in the Methodist church on Christmas evening. From a third meeting, held on the morning of Dec. 26, some forty women marched down the aisle and out into the wintry streets, while the men remained in a service of prayer and song and the church bell tolled. On that first day of work the women visited drug stores and saloons, with prayer and song and Bible reading and exhortation.

The next day, Saturday, was a stormy Winter's day. Again the men met at the church, while the women marched forth and the bell tolled. It was the beginning of an eight days' unremitting crusade. Where the saloon doors were locked against them the women knelt in the snow and held prayer meetings on the streets. On the third day came the first victory, and the women themselves knocked in the heads of whisky barrels and poured the liquors out into the gutter to the accompaniment of prayer and song. On the next day another saloon surrendered, the church bells pealed, and again the sluggish waters of Paint Creek received an unwonted supply of stimulants from the liquor that flowed into the gutters.

Within the eight days every saloon was closed and the druggists were pledged to sell only for medicinal purposes. The attacks of the bands of women on the streets, the meetings of the men at the churches and the tolling of the church bells had been unceasing, and within the town the work was done. Out of town were two beer gardens and these were the objects of a longer and more difficult campaign, in which searchlights, playing upon the entrances and continual occupation of hastily built shacks by the women, were met by court actions and injunctions. In the end, the beer gardens were vanquished as had been the town saloons.

Prayer Meeting at a Saloon.

The Cincinnati Commercial reporter had returned to the town on Jan. 20 for a tour of inspection and wrote as follows:

"I found myself in the thick of a fight renewed. When, after a good dinner, I inquired what was in progress that would be likely to interest a stranger, the landlord of the Shaw House promptly made reply: 'There ain't a saloon open in the whole place. Mighty dry here for a Cincinnati man. But there's a women's prayer meeting at a saloon just out of the corporation over the creek. Maybe you never attended one.' * * * The main body of the ladies soon arrived, with right centre on the doorstep, the wings extending each way beyond the corners of the house and a rearward column along the walk to the gate. In ludicrous contrast the routed revelers stood in a little knot fifty feet away, still gnawing at the pigs-feet they had held on to in their hurried flight, while your reporter took a convenient seat on the fence. * * *

"I shall need the pen of an Irving and the pencil of a Darley to give any adequate idea of the scene. On one side a score of elegant ladies singing with all the earnestness of impassioned natures. A few rods away a knot of disturbed revelers uncertain whether to stand or fly. Halfway between, the nervous saloon keeper bobbing around like a case of fiddle strings and on the fence by the ladies a cold-blooded lawyer and an excited reporter scribbling away as if their lives depended on it. It was painful from its intensity."

Four months later the Town Council in effect went "wet" and gradually the saloons returned.

In the meantime a State convention had been called by Dr. Dio Lewis to meet at Columbus and an attempt made at organization. Later another convention was held in Cincinnati. Committees named at both of these conventions were united, and at a joint meeting at Springfield, Ohio, on June 17, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union came into being. It became a national organization at a convention held in Cleveland in November.

SOVIET COMMISSARY DESCRIBES SEBASTAPOL AS CITY OF CRIME

Finds Ragged Urchins Picking Pockets and Roisterers Disturbing Hospital

RUSSIA'S historic city of Sebastopol has fallen upon evil days, according to M. Semashko, the People's Commissary for Public Health, who in the newspaper Pravda thus describes a visit:

"I arrived there on a Sunday evening, and my first impression was excellent. At the station I was pleased to see sailors in faultless uniforms. But what did I see when I left the station? Streets filled with idly strolling throngs and ragged, neglected children for whom nobody seemed to care. A well dressed man in front of me suddenly stopped, felt his pockets and then gave chase to a small boy who had openly stolen his purse. The bystanders laughed; not one made a movement to aid him. The companions of the little thief ran this way and that, whistling and shrieking, while the victim, with a gesture of despair, turned and went his way.

"One solitary policeman was on duty. He, of course, was unable to prevent the activities of the depraved children and youths. When their conduct became too outrageous, he would reprove them—at which the young ruffians would merely jeer and run to the other side of the street to continue their fights among themselves and their attacks upon passersby.

"At 1 o'clock in the morning I passed a famous sanitarium, known all over Russia as a place for the curing of nervous diseases. I cannot believe that any sick are able to recover there. The place was surrounded with the deafening roar of night roisterers. A dilapidated street railroad added its racket.

"By 2 o'clock in the morning the streets were so infested by a vicious rabble that it was advisable for all decent people to retire from them. Again and again one could hear from just around some corner the shrill cry, 'Help! Help! Murder!' Such is daily life in Sebastopol."

FASHIONS DEMAND DISTINCTION IN WRAPS

EVENING MODELS ORNATE

Velvets Are Much in Vogue and Jeweled Effects Find Favor—Extremes Shown.

FIRST night at the opera, where evening dress is seen under the happiest auspices, presented this season two distinct innovations. One was the elaborate evening wrap and another was the vogue of white. The feminine costumes in that big audience appeared more elaborate than has been true for several preceding years. Gowns seemed richer in fabric, some glittering with crystal and spangles, wraps appeared more splendid and white seemed to predominate. In and about the boxes and in the foyer women representative of society wore costumes from American as well as French designers that established several entirely new styles. The general effect of the pageant was that of more extreme fashions than are worn at a private entertainment, and of the lavish use of brocades and all the more luxurious materials, with trimmings, jewels and accessories. This premiere of the music season being regarded as the keynote of fashion in New York society, a Winter of elaborate beauty in dress seems assured.

MODISTES and their clientele have both expressed the feeling lately that a significant movement forward has been due in the styles of evening wraps. Gowns have been sensational in design from time to time while wraps have remained mostly so conventional as to have become almost standardized. A wrap-around or a coat of some handsome material with a collar,-perhaps cuffs and a border of fur, has been the usual type of wrap that has been worn over an evening gown. The gown itself has become more elaborate in detail, tending more to an ensemble effect, more emphatic in relief because the wrap was of less complex architecture. The more ornate the gown the simpler the wrap, plain velvet, brocade or metallic cloth covering the most extreme gown of solid palletted pattern with crystals, jewels, ostrich, fur, gilt and silver. The latest ensembles flashed before the eyes of fashion are daring combinations of gorgeous materials and a wealth of ornamentation of one sort and another.

ALL of the prophesies of the vogue of velvet are realized in the latest evening wraps, for it is far and away the favorite fabric among designers. There must always be, of course, a variety of styles in material, and there are many this season; but the flattering quality of velvet lures both the designer and the women who give thought to appearance. The velvet wrap is not, however, the same thing that has been offered before. The character and quality of the material alone are insufficient and are used only as a foundation for beautiful embroidery in silk, metal and chenille, hand painting and a dazzling surface of sequins, beads and jewels. To this is added in some of the latest models fur, ostrich, marabou or fringe in a scheme which impresses one almost as over-elaboration.

When plain velvet, panne or chiffon velvet is used, the wrap is lavishly trimmed with fur, an enormous collar, wide cuffs on the inevitable dolman sleeves and, almost always, a deep band about the bottom. On some of the new wraps this band is shaped to form a very deep border, straight or flaring, the type of wrap that suggests luxury in every detail as well as the last word in comfort on a Winter night.

CURIOUSLY enough, however, the first model shown in the richly embroidered type of evening wrap from a prominent Paris house is not of velvet, but of satin. It is an ivory white in dolman shape, with sleeves cut in a deep line at the intersecting point and tapering toward the hand. Almost the entire surface of the back, the front and the greater part of the sleeves is covered with a graceful pattern, rather medieval in feeling and done in fine gilt and silver thread. Points and motifs in the design are made of brilliants as centres, combined with crystal beads, giving an effect of crystalline loveliness that is difficult to visualize. A collar and cuffs of white fox finish this wrap, which will be worn by a fashionable bride, not with her wedding dress, but with an elaborate evening gown of georgette and polished silver spangles. This wrap is lined with velvet, as many of the evening wraps are, in a faint shade of rose.

These delightful wraps are voluminous and graceful, in dazzling white with linings of velvets in delicate shades of blue, rose, yellow, the orchids, of which there are many subtle degrees, and green. A superlative wrap of white chiffon velvet is embroidered as a deep border with sequins in opalescent tints, very lustrous and pulsing with color, with strass and crystal beads interwoven. This, with all its richness of design, is lined with white velvet and has a deep collar and cuffs of snowy fox.

Another wrap of distinction has much the suggestion of moonlight—cold, silvery and elusive. It is made of high lustre panne velvet, traced with silver in a conventionalized fleur-de-lis pattern picked out with crystal and steely silver spangles. White fox is used for the collar, and a silver lamé, shot with palest blue, for the lining.

SOMETHING as delicate, subtle and lovely as has ever been shown is the new brocaded chiffon velvet. The foundation is of chiffon, light as thistledown and clinging in quality like a cobweb, and the pattern of downy velvet is in relief. This is a fabric of distinct elegance, particularly in white and in black, but a large card of charming colors, delicate in shades, is shown for evening wear. Wraps made of brocaded chiffon velvet are lined with a plain color in velvet or satin, some with lame, which is now shown shot with any of the new evening shades and of a very soft texture. One of orchid and silver velvet in a pattern of the flower with large, graceful leaves is lined with silver lamé showing a background on silver and has a large collar of chinchilla, which is considered very smart this season.

A detail of some of these wraps of lame and all of the metal brocades is the touch of silver or gold in a long tassel with which the sleeve is finished, or which is attached at a corner of the material in a model having a cape effect formed of a square cleverly shaped to make a sleeve. Ornaments to serve as fastenings are made of gold or silver cord and of beads.

FUR is important in evening wraps and many varieties are shown. Fox is, of course, much in demand, especially white fox and the lighter colors. The intense shades introduced two seasons ago are little used except on the wraps that are designed for the Southern resorts. Sable, mink, chinchilla are all good, and several novelty furs are shown, though few of these are fine enough to combine with handsome fabrics. Because of the number of new colors in the velvets and metal brocades some of the new evening wraps have the roll collar of the material.

In plain fabrics the collar is shirred and heavily padded, the most fashionable shape being very large and standin away from the neck and round. Ostrich is used with dainty effect on some of the wraps of chiffon brocade, and on satin wraps that are elaborately embroidered or beaded. A lovely evening dolman cape of chiffon velvet in the new shade of orchid called diadem is trimmed with ostrich, which forms a boa collar and borders the front and bottom edges of the garment in the most ethereal way.

White Fox Is Lavishly Used to Trim a Dolman in the New Castilian Red. An Evening Wrap in a Parisian Design Is Illustrated in Rich Brocade of Gold and Diadem, the Newest Shade of Orchid, Lined With the Plain Orchid. The Collar and Cuffs Are of Sable.

COLOR IS IMPORTANT IN WRAPS

COLOR enters into the latest mode in a manner so significant that trimming and the entire scheme of ensemble is a problem which requires study and the exercise of discretion. Old dyes have been treated by experts to produce new phases with many delightful results, with new and entertaining names to designate them. There is a rare shade of turquoise and an old Gobelin blue. That soft shade that became popular under the name of bois de rose is now called meadow pink. A velvet in mellow gray is known as gull, and a flaming contrast is castilian red. Golden poppy is a vivid orange, and athenia is the old-fashioned ashes of roses.

A chiffon velvet wrap in the new yellow known as popcorn, lined with satin in the same shade with wide upstanding collar and cuffs of kolinsky, is a delightful illustration of the possibilities in ensembles and combinations with the new colors. Cameo pink and silver chiffon velvet brocade in combination have a voluminous collar of chinchilla fur and lining of silver lamé shot with pink. There are in the fine fabrics artistic colorings that will be shown to advantage also in the coming millinery modes, in ostrich feather trimming and in the big evening fans. One among the most conspicuous is tiger lily, a glowing, reddish orange; a brown called marron glacé, light tan known as monkey skin, mother goose, which is a beige in both light and dark shades, and gooseberry green and vert-de-gris.

FUR wraps for evening are much worn, the most modish furs being sable, ermine and chinchilla. These are made in the dolman style, or in one of the combinations of dolman shape and cape, and they are lined with the beautiful new velvets, lamé or satin in delicate or very rich shades. In the lighter type of wrap for evening are square shawls of Oriental silks, as well as brocades and metal tissues both plain and figured. Most of the shawls have deep fringe and are embroidered or painted in colorful patterns.

Paris Pins and Bracelets Are Novel—Other Items for the Shopper

FROM Paris comes a new pin, designed to be suitable for many purposes. It follows in outline a cherry stem with leaf blown back. The leaf is in filigree, with fine little twists and turns to represent veins and ribs. White gold is used in its composition, outlined with very small rhinestones which give it a skeleton-like aspect.

Triple bangle bracelets are made of three different kinds of gold. They are called Barcelona, perhaps in honor of the Spanish singer who is now visiting New York. These bangles are somewhat heavier than are customarily seen and are worn either separately or attached by means of a small band.

A medieval necklace of the short flat collarette type frequently associated with coronation jewelry is made entirely of disk-like medallions in filigree. Some of the disks are set with small, richly colored stones, others depend upon solid floral designs, but both kinds are finished with elaborately studded pendants.

Bits of old ivory finely hand-carved are having a vogue in Paris, being made to serve many useful and decorative purposes. As an example—a little owl is perched on a galalith base. Aside from its ornamental value, it is a most useful object, for it is equipped with a mechanism for lighting cigarettes.

THE new "polo bracelets" leave not the slightest doubt in the mind as to what they represent. In place of the usual links, horseshoes, stirrups and other parts of a horse's equipment are adapted in miniature to serve the purpose. To complete the sport theme transparent disks allow to show through a miniature picture of the player in red coat jumping a fence on a spirited horse.

Old-time charms return anew to fringe the most sophisticated little filigree bracelets. They are so quaint and charming with their animal dangles that include camels, elephants, dogs and, in fact, any animal in the zoo.

NEW oblong bags of genuine snakeskin, showing the new yoke effect, boast a tiny tab on one side to correspond with a thumb loop on the other by which they may be carried. Inside there are two immense pockets, one with a flap and clasp, and the other divided into two sections to accommodate a purse and separate mirror.

Lelong uses suede for a deep bag mounted on a shining metal frame. Although the clasp and frame are in one, the frame is sectional, thereby allowing easier access to its contents. A wide banding of the suede makes the handle and permits it to be swung over the arm or wrist like a shopping bag. This bag comes in a variety of colors, including jungle green, Chanel red, navy, black and brown.

WITH the ever increasing fashion for pearls in one style or another, there is now a new choker made up of small pearls strung together in link form. In some instances double or even triple strands are used, but all are joined by an oblong crystal clasp that may be worn either in front or back. The bracelets that match are made the same way even to the little crystal clasps.

Velvet is very fashionable for semi-formal dress for college girls and even for little girls. No fabric is more flattering, more serviceable and, at the moment, more popular. A velvet frock, made after any one of the many intriguing models now being shown, is almost indispensable in the wardrobe of the sub-deb or the girl at boarding school or college. It is suitable for informal luncheon, for dinner, and many occasions under the school roof; and it is generally the answer to just the right frock for excursions to the matinee and holidays in town or country.

PARIS ADOPTS BLOUSED WAIST

Wide, Fitted Belt and a Straight Skirt Hint New Silhouette

PARIS.

MIDSEASON collections of fashions just now being shown in Paris confirm, in one way at least, the assertion repeatedly made by the French designers, that styles develop logically from what has gone before and that they themselves are powerless to change that trend. The already familiar waist, bloused behind, proves the truth of this contention by becoming the waist bloused all around, the most significant note, perhaps, of the new exhibitions.

To avoid an effect of heaviness with this bloused waist, the skirts of the new gowns have become much less elaborate and straighter in line than they have been for some time. They are quite often entirely plain, wrapped about the figure with an overlapping flap at the side, either front or back, much as the remembered sheath skirt was. Where elaboration is required, the skirt is shown in straight tiers, a circular fullness inserted at either side of the front, or else it is made with a tight underskirt with the fuller overskirt split into four or more panels. Between this waist, bloused all around, and the straight-line skirt, is generally a belt about four inches in width, half above and half crossing the hip. It is fitted smoothly at all times and often set into the gown itself.

The long-fitted sleeve extending over the hand in a pointed or curved outline is chosen most frequently to accompany this new silhouette, though the choice is not limited to the one style. Perhaps the type second in favor is the bell sleeve with a little puffed undersleeve of lace or contrasting material.

FOR afternoon gowns soft satin in both black and colors, its sheen not too high, is taking the place in the spotlight lately held by crêpe de chine. Anna shows a charming black and white study in a supple black satin that incorporates many of the new ideas sponsored for the midseason. The waist of this gown is, of course, bloused moderately all around but the skirt, while preserving its close straight outline, is given elegance by a flat cut-out flounce that begins as a narrow panel on the left hip attached under a double row of small white buttons, swings around the front of the skirt as an applied eight-inch border and comes up the right side where it forms a short but bouffant side drapery. Black and white striped ribbon, two inches in width, faces the straight collar that can be worn wrapped about the neck, made with the aid of the double row of white buttons. There is a chic cuff about the long-fitted sleeves; and attention is further drawn to the wide-swathed belt. The front of the waist along each side of the collar opening has its double row of white buttons also.

PLAIDS are a notable feature of these new collections, used both as trimmings and as whole garments. Drecoll lines a smart coat of navy blue crepella, bound with black braid, with a plaid silk softer than taffeta in tones of green, yellow and red. The collar of this coat, faced in the plaid, is cut like the collar of a motor coat and could be worn fastened snugly about the neck with a buttoned flap to hold it in place. The fronts of the coat are faced with plaid and turned back to form full length lapels. With this is worn a dress of navy crepella, piped in red, with collar and cuffs of the plaid.

Blue, yellow and gray in big blocks make the plaid that Anna uses charmingly on a coat dress of heavy crêpe de chine in navy blue. The coat part of this dress has a loose, bolero back, its edge cut in three semi-circles with a four-inch border of upright strips of narrow black, cire ribbon. The coat opens in front over a dress-like section of the plaid silk and permits the collar and triangular side jabot that apparently belongs to the plaid dress, to serve also as its collar and frill.

PLISSE, the fine pleating that was practically banned from the Fall collections, is very much in evidence again. Worth uses it on many afternoon gowns in various ways, and employs it altogether on a certain type of sport costume that he has originated. An example of this cool, jaunty sport suit has a finely pleated skirt of black crêpe de chine attached to a round-necked and sleeveless waist, also pleated, of white crêpe de chine.

DOLMAN SHOWN IN MANY STYLES

IN the matter of line the word dolman is used to cover several styles of wrap. In general outline it has the width and length and large dolman sleeve which ends in a tapering line to cuff size at the band or is gathered into a cuff band, usually of fur. The latest model is an adaptation of the old style dolman, which is merely a basis of its architecture, and now is cut to emphasize width above the hip and a snug or wrap-around treatment below. The upper part blouses over the interesting line, which is either an inconspicuous cord or a girdle of embroidery or passementerie forming a high light in the design.

One of the most distinguished models of this type is made by Martial et Armand, in velvet, with round high collar and cuffs of fox and a girdle of bead and metal needlework. The lifted line of this bloused dolman is very fashionable and is illustrated in some delightful models from Premet. Lenief's favorite model is a coat which flares into a ripple all around and is lavishly trimmed with fur. Worth makes a gorgeous evening coat of brocaded silver lamé that swings from informal box pleats from the shoulders and has a fur trimming of fox forming a deep band around the bottom, very large collar and elbow length cuffs.

NEXT to pale pink, black and pink, black or white, perhaps the shaded grays are as popular as any other color for the new evening gowns. Yteb has made a demurely lovely bolero gown in shades of gray, using white crêpe satin for the foundation. Over this foundation and opened in front to allow the white to be glimpsed is a skirt in three layers of chiffon graduated in color and length from the upper layer of silver gray to the lower one of steel gray. The waist, on the contrary, shades from dark to light with a transparent yoke of dark gray, and the bolero jacket of silver gray is embroidered in silver paillettes. The wrapped belt is of velvet in an almost oyster-white shade.

EVENTS FOR DEBUTANTES LEAD CALENDAR IN SOCIETY

MANY PARTIES ARE ARRANGED

Luncheons, Dinners and Dances This Month Are Numerous

WHILE there was a fitting inauguration of the débutante season last week it was only the beginning of a period of really hard work for them and with ever increasing duties and events. In combination with their many other engagements those of the débutantes who recently were made provisional members of the Junior League for the ensuing season, devote each morning to several hours at the clubhouse of the league, where there are numerous instructive talks concerning the duties of the novices, for such they may be called, and they do not allow anything to interfere with these tasks.

To the débutante who only last year was not included in the parties attended by her elders the pleasures of anticipation are great and just now everything seems new and strange, but with meeting the same friends on various entertainments, day in and day out, there is sure to be some seeming monotony before many weeks have passed. This week will be busy enough, but with the return from universities, colleges and preparatory schools for the holiday, Thanksgiving week will offer a succession of parties that will fill up all the hours of the day or night that can possibly be devoted to diversions.

BEGINNING tomorrow Mrs. Richard Boardman will give a luncheon at Pierre's for her daughter, Miss Eleanor Boardman, and numerous others of the débutantes. At the Plaza, Miss Margaret Howland Meyer, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Garrison Meyer, who was introduced to society in New York during the season of 1924-25, will give a dinner to fifty of her friends. In Washington, D. C., at the Mayflower, Mr. and Mrs. Lyman B. Kendall will give an afternoon reception with dancing to introdnce their daughter, Miss Jane Kendall, for whom they are to give a costume dinner on the night of Nov. 25. Among their guests of tomorrow will be friends from this city.

MRS. WILLIAM REYNOLDS BROWN will give a dance at Pierre's on Saturday night for her granddaughter, Miss Charlotte Brown, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Donald W. Brown, for whom her parents will give a coming-out reception on Dec. 10 at their home, 40 East Thirty-eighth Street. Among the many festivities of next week will be a luncheon at the Park Lane which Mrs. Charles Sherman Haight is giving on Monday for her daughter, Miss Harriet Haight, for whom Mr. and Mrs. Haight are to give a dinner dance at the same place on Dec. 28. On Thanksgiving Eve Mr. and Mrs. Robert M. Littlejohn are to give a dinner to fifty at their home, 23 East Sixty-seventh Street, for their daughter, Miss Charlotte Townsend Littlejohn, and also for Miss Mildred Barclay Van der Poel, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. S. Oakley Van der Poel. After it Mr. and Mrs. Littlejohn will take their guests to Pierre's, where Mr. and Mrs. Van der Poel are to give a dance for their daughter and some of the younger friends of the family. Both Miss Littlejohn and Miss Van der Poel were in Southampton for the Summer.

ON Thanksgiving night Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Latham Clarke will give a large dance at Pierre's to introduce their daughter, Miss Florence Kip Clarke. In advance of it there will be several dinners given at the homes of Mr. and Mrs. Clarke's friends. Miss Clarke was presented at one of the night courts held last June at Buckingham Palace when she was presented to King George and Queen Mary with the diplomatic circle. Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Lindley Stout will give an afternoon reception with dancing in the ballroom of the Park Lane to introduce their daughter, Miss Elizabeth Wilson Stout. Mr. and Mrs. Henry J. Whitehouse, who will be in town a short time before sailing for Europe, are to give a dinner at Pierre's on the night after Thanksgiving to introduce their daughter, Miss Evelyn Whitehouse, who passed the Summer with her parents at Ridgewood, their country place in Mount Kisco, N. Y. Miss Whitehouse is a granddaughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. W. Fitz Hugh Whitehouse of Eastbourne Lodge, one of the notable estates in Newport, R. I.

MR. AND MRS. GARRARD COMLY of Tuxedo Park are to give a luncheon at Pierre's on Nov. 26 to introduce their daughter, Miss Katherine Comly, and at the same time for Miss Elsie Yandell Barber, youngest daughter of Mrs. Donn Barber and the late Mr. Barber. Before starting on a trip around the world in Janu y, Mrs. Barber will give a series of dinners with dancing for her daughter. On the same date Mr. and Mrs. George W. Johnston will give a dinner at Sherry's for their débutante daughter, Miss Margaret P. Johnston, as well as for Miss Elsie Barber. At the Colony Club on that date Mr. and Mrs. Ronald Eliot Curtis will give an afternoon reception with dancing to introdnce their twin daughters, the Misses Madeleine and Lettys Curtis. Mr. and Mrs. Robert S. Kilbourne will hold an old-fashioned reception on the afternoon of Nov. 27 at their home, 104 East Thirty-eighth Street, to introduce their daughter, Miss Elizabeth Kilbourne, for whom they will give a dinner dance at the Plaza on Dec. 30.

MRS. FRANK GRISWOLD HALL will give a luncheon Tuesday at Pierre's for her two débutante daughters, the Misses Norma and Lucy Lee Hall, and another large luncheon party at the same place will be given by Mrs. Alfred Ogden for her daughter, Miss Katharine Ogden. The girls at these luncheons will report for duty at night time at the hockey match in aid of the Grosvenor Neighborhood House, to be held in the Madison Square Garden, which will give a decided variety to the day's diversions. Mrs. William Metcalfe Stone of Flushing, Queens, is to give a luncheon at Pierre's on Wednesday for her daughter, Miss Charlotte Metcalfe Stone.

Mrs. Douglas Robinson will give on Tuesday afternoon a reception in the ballroom of the Colony Club for her débutante granddaughter, Miss Helen Douglas Robinson, daughter of Assistant Secretary of the Navy and Mrs. Theodore Douglas Robinson.

WEDDINGS AND ENGAGEMENTS

Miss Eleanor Pettinos Is To Be Married in Paris Tuesday

THERE is much interest in the forthcoming marriage of Miss Eleanor Pettinos, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles E. Pettinos, to Richard Allmand Blow of Chicago, which will take place Tuesday noon in the American Pro-Cathedral in Paris. The ceremony will be performed by the Very Rev. Frederick Wilson Beekman, Dean of the cathedral, and will be followed by a reception at the Ritz, Place Vendome.

The engagement was announced in July from Paris, where Miss Pettinos was with her mother. Mr. Blow with his mother, Mrs. George Preston Blow, sailed fom New York several weeks ago for Paris, and Mr. Pettinos sailed a short while later. Mr. and Mrs. F. A. S. Franklin sailed on the Majestic Nov. 6 to be in Paris for the wedding.

Miss Pettinos was introduced to society in this city and has taken an active part in social life during the last two years. She makes her home with her parents at the Plaza in the Winter. Her fiancé is a brother of Mrs. Wayne Chatfield-Taylor.

SEVERAL engagements announced recently are of much interest in New York society. Mr. and Mrs. Murray Witherbee Dodge of Hospital, Mount Kisco and this city, last week announced that of their eldest daughter, Miss Elizabeth Lee Dodge, to William Harmon Beers of New York.

Miss Dodge, who attended Miss Chapin's School in this city and Miss Porter's School in Farmington, Conn., was introduced to society a few years ago in New York. She is a member of the Junior League. She is a niece of Mrs. William Francis Cochran, being the former Miss Emily Fordyce Dodge, and of Mrs. James W. Hazard Jr., who was Miss Alice Dodge, also a granddaughter of Mrs. Arthur Murray Dodge and of the late Mrs. Evelyn Dwight Barker.

Mr. Beers was graduated from Columbia University in 1903 and later from the Beaux Arts in Paris. He is Secretary of the New York Institute of Architects.

AN engagement announced last Wednesday was that of Miss Jane Brientnall Peters, daughter of Mrs. Ralph Peters of Garden City, L. I., to Ford Wright, son of the late G. A. Wright and the late Mr. Wright of Bellevue, Ohio.

Miss Peters is the daughter of the late Ralph Peters, President of the Long Island Railroad. She was graduated from the Misses Masters School in Dobbs Ferry, N. Y. Mr. Wright was graduated from Williams with the class of '19, and during the World War he served with the United States Navy. No date has been mentioned for the wedding.

MR. and Mrs. Frank A. Vanderlip of Scarborough-on-Hudson recently announced the engagement of their daughter, Miss Charlotte Delight Vanderlip, to Norton Conway, son of Mr. and Mrs. Carl C. Conway of 1,107 Fifth Avenue and Scarborough-on-Hudson.

Miss Vanderlip who was a débutante of last season, is a senior at Bryn Mawr College and is a member of the Junior League. Mr. Conway will graduate next June from Yale.

NOTED ENGLISH WOMEN VISIT ANIMAL HOSPITAL

THE Duchess of Hamilton, President of the Animal Defence Society of England, and Miss Lind-af-Hageby, founder of the organization, visited the Ellis Prince Speyer Hospital for Animals at 339 Lafayette Street after returning from the International Congress on Animal Protection in Philadelphia recently. The society which they represented at the meeting recently erected a model slaughter house in London for educational purposes. As a protest against the method of catching fur-bearing animals in steel traps, neither of the women wears furs.

DEBS TO TAKE PART IN FIESTA

Varied Program Arranged to Raise Funds for the Neurological Institute's Activities

A HOLIDAY fiesta will be held under the auspices of the Cooperative Committee of the Neurological Institute, of which Miss Mary Lincoln Aldrich is Chairman. The fiesta will begin early on Dec. 4, when hundreds of persons of the world of society will patronize the Schrafft tea room at 556 Fifth Avenue. Fifty per cent. of the gross receipts from luncheons, tea dance and dinners on that day will be devoted to the needs of the Neurological Institute. The program will last until midnight in the Alexandrian Room. The hour of serving luncheon will permit those who desire to hear the performance at the Metropolitan Opera or he on time for the matinees at any of the theatres.

There will be several novel features carried out under the direction of débutantes of this and last season and some of the younger married women of society. Tea and dancing to the music of Roger Wolfe Kahn's Orchestra will attract many who come from the opera or theatres. During the afternoon Miss Elsie Yandell Barber, a débutante of this season, will call to her assistance a number of her friends, among whom will be the Misses Phyllis Baker, Camille Miller, Rosalind Barnum, Patty Pease, Lucie Bedford, Natalie Peters, Bertha Benkard, Peggie Phipps, Claire Birge, Natalie Potter, Charlotte Brown, Sally Pratt, Ellen Comly, Helen Douglas Robinson, Katharine Comly, Gwendolyn Rose, Cornelia Curtis, Etbel Schniewind, Pauline Dodge, Katharine Steele, Constance Fox, Frances Gilimore, May Swords, Rachel Hammond, Katharine Tod, Frances Hand, Mildred Van der Poel, Adelaide Hutton, Jane Watson, Marie Iselin, Alice Whitehouse, Margaret P. Johnston, Helen Wilmerding, Clare Kellogg, Hope Yandell and Elizabeth Woodward.

It is expected that the gala dinner company will be a most brilliant and interesting gathering. Already tables have been reserved by Mrs. Montgomery Hare, Mrs. Scoville Treadwell, Miss Mary Lincoln Aldrich, Mrs. Frank Hunter Potter, Mrs. W. Kintzing Post, Mrs. Gordon Knox Bell, Mrs. John Corbin, Mrs. Richard Billings, Mrs. William Rand and Mrs. John Sherman Hoyt.

The Institute has a department that is without revenue, and this includes the social service department as well as that which provides for free care and treatment.

Among those directly interested in the welfare of the Neurological Institute, who also are acting as patronesses, are Mrs. William K. Vanderbilt, Miss Ruth V. Twombly, Mrs. E. Henry Harriman, Mrs. Vincent Astor, Mrs. Henry P. Davison, Miss Mabel Choate, Mrs. Clarence Dillon, Mrs. G. Beekman Hoppin, Mrs. Daniel Guggenheim, Mrs. Julius Ochs Adler, Mrs. James W. Gerard, Mrs. Harrison Williams, Mrs. Victor Morawetz, Mrs. A. J. Drexel Biddle Jr., Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Mrs. Walter N. Rothschild, Mrs. Charles H. Sabin, Mrs. Ogden Reid, Mrs. O'Donnell Iselin, Mrs. Otto H. Kahn, Mrs. Cornelius N. Bliss, Mrs. Frank Vance Storrs, Mrs. Pleasants Pennington, Mrs. William Woodward, Mrs. Price Post, Mrs. Ernest Schelling and Mrs. Sidney C. Borg.

Not only will the share of receipts from luncheons, tea and dinner be given to the hospital, but by arrangement with Frank G. Shattuck the same percentage of all articles sold in the establishment that day. Seats or tables for the gala dinner may be obtained from Mrs. John Blair at the Institute, 149 East Forty-eighth Street, or at the Irving Bank and Trust Company, Park Avenue and Forty-eighth Street.

DATES ARE ANNOUNCED FOR YORKVILLE DANCES

MRS. A. MANSFIELD PATTERSON, President of the Yorkville Community Association, has arranged another series of dances for the benefit of that organization and, as for several years, they will be held in the ballroom of the Ritz-Carlton The dates are Nov. 30, Dec. 14, Jan 11 Feb. 8 and March 1. The work of this association is sanctioned by the New York Board of Education and it has a number of active as well as useful branches, that include a league for tenants who reside in Yorkville, clubs for mothers and for the younger members of the community, and an athletic field. Funds for carrying on these activities are received chiefly from personal contributions.

ICE ATTRACTIONS TO RAISE FUND

Grosvenor House Benefit Opens Hockey Season Tuesday Night

THE professional hockey season will begin on Tuesday, when the New York Rangers and the Montreal Maroons meet in a match at Madison Square Garden for the benefit of Grosvenor House, 321 East Forty-ninth Street. In addition to the match an elaborate ice ballet will be staged during the intermissions between periods. Twelve girls from European capitals, who have come direct from the Admiral Palace, Berlin, will give an exhibition of fancy skating. They will be led by Katie Schmidt, Frieda Peterson and Hans Witter.

Grosvenor House was founded in 1915 as a lunchroom for public school children whose mothers were at work all day. Since then it has extended its scope until now it is a social centre for the neighborhood, and is used by the mothers as well as the children.

Miss Dorothy Battle is Chairman of the committee in charge of arrangements. Assisting her are Miss Alouise Boker, President of the association; Mrs. Sheldon Coleman, Patroness Committee; Miss Dorothy Collins, Junior Committee; C. Shelby Carter, Patrons Committee; Miss Amey Denny, Tickets Committee, and Miss Martha Lambert, Treasurer of the association.

Among those who have taken boxes and tickets are Mrs. Charles Sherman Haight, Mrs. McLane Van Ingen, Mrs. Douglas M. Moffatt, Miss Carola Dommerich, Mrs. Frederic E. Church, Mrs. Charles T. Church, Mrs. Lewis Lapham, Mrs. Stephen Clark, Mrs. Frank P. Shepard, Mrs. Huntington Lyman, Mrs. D. Hunter McAlpin Jr., Mrs. Columbus Iselin, Mrs. Samuel W. Lambert, Mrs. Jonathan Bulkley, Mrs. Ernest Fahnestock, Miss Amey Denny, Mrs. Irving McKesson, Mrs. Percy A. Rockefeller, Mrs. Yale Kneeland, Mrs. Samuel S. Duryee, Howard Dean, Mrs. Louis Condit Hay, Mrs. Reginald E. Wigham, Mrs. John S. Shepard, Miss Florence Clendenin, Mrs. Charles Lewis Tiffany, Mrs. Paul C. Colonna, Mrs. Arthur Osgood Choate, Mrs. Ward Chamberlin, Chauncey B. Spears, Mrs. William A. Simonson, Mrs. J. Macy Willets, Mrs. Philip La Boutillier, Miss Cornelia Chapin, Mrs. Arthur Stem, Mrs. Junius Spencer Morgan, Mrs. William Jordan Rogers and Mrs. William J. Lippincott.

METROPOLITAN HOSPITAL TO BE AIDED BY DANCE

THROUGH dancing it is hoped that the Metropolitan Hospital will gain funds to aid the social service work of that institution, which is greatly in need. It has been decided to hold what will be called the Junior Auxiliary Ball on the night of Dec. 8 in the ballroom suite of the Park Lane.

Through the kindly offices of the auxiliary last year relief was given to more than 10,000 needy persons regardless of race, creed or color.

Care also is given to the families of the hospital patients to tide them over until the wage earner recovers, to pay rent, provide food, coal, clothing and to procure suitable employment for patients when they are able to return to work. Surgical appliances are supplied when necessary. There also are convalescent care, custodial care for children, and everything possible is done to re-establish those who have suffered through illness or other misfortune.

Mrs. Reginald Victor Hiscoe will have the assistance of several members of the auxiliary in arrangements for the ball. Among them are Miss Dorothy J. Achells, Miss Noel Chatillon, Miss Charlotte K. Demorest, Miss Helene O. Edmonds, Mrs. James C. Fargo, Mrs. Harold F. Gibson, Miss Elizabeth Gaston, Mrs. Horace L. Hotchkiss 3d, Miss Grace Hayes, Miss Betty Kress, Mrs. Martin J. Quinn Jr., Mrs. William V. C. Ruxton and Mrs. Carroll L. Wainwright.

Among the patronesses are Mrs. Frederick S. Armstrong, Mrs. George E. Chatillon, Mrs. Allen B. Forbes, Mrs. Frederick K. Gaston, Mrs. William Henry Hays, Mrs. F. Meredith Blagden, Mrs. Roland L. Redmond, Mrs. Edwin S. Schenck, Mrs. Henry S. Thompson, Mrs. John A. Topping and Mrs. Albert H. Wiggin.

The auxiliary is trying to raise a sufficient sum to pay the salary of a social service worker in the hospital.

Tickets at $5 each may be obtained from Miss Juliana Cutting, 598 Madison Avenue.

CHELSEA NURSERY CLUB APPEALS FOR MEMBERS

AN appeal for members of the Foster-Parents' Health Club of the Chelsea Day Nursery—the only organization of its kind which cares for children in families where the father has been stricken with tuberculosis and the mother is compelled to work to avoid sending the children to an institution—has been issued by Mrs. Herman M. Biggs

The Chelsea Day Nursery, which the club will support, is located at 346 West Twenty-seventh Street and daily cares for a hundred or more children ranging in age from six months upward. Cooperating with Mrs. Biggs in forming the club are Charles E. Hughes, Honorary President; Mrs. Cornelius N. Bliss, Chairman; Mrs. John H. Prentice, Vice Chairman; Mrs. Postlethwaite Cobb, Secretary, and Mrs. F. W. Myers, Treasurer. Florence N. Le Fevre, R. N., is Superintendent and Dr. William D. Tyrell is attending child specialist.

THEATRE BENEFIT FOR BELLEVUE

Auxiliary Arranges for Proceeds of Performance to Assist in Hospital's Tubercular Work

THE performance of "Criss Cross," with Fred and Dorothy Stone, at the Globe Theatre Wednesday night will be given for the benefit of the Auxiliary to the Tuberculosis Division of Bellevue Hospital.

This organization, of which Dr James Alexander Miller is director and Miss Blanche Potter, Chairman, was organized eighteen years ago. The first meeting took place in April, 1908, at Miss Potter's residence, and all of those then present still continue in the work.

The auxiliary supports the Bellevue Settlement House, 206 East Thirtieth Street, a home for tubercular women and children who must be segregated, and also provides sanatorium care for about 152 men, women and young children on the Bellevue day camp boat, which it equipped and which is now anchored at the foot of East Twenty-sixth Street.

In supplementing the work of the hospital and giving the patients many luxuries which they would otherwise be unable to afford, the auxiliary has become one of the important factors in the charitable care of tuberculosis padents in the City of New York. It depends each year upon its annual benefit to increase the funds needed.

Officers and members of the auxiliary are Dr. James Alexander Miller, Director; Miss Blanche Potter, Chairman; Mrs. Louis Condit Hay, Vice Chairman; Miss Angelica Livingston, Secretary; Mrs. William Willis Reese, Treasurer; Miss Sarah E. Shaw, R. N., Headworker; Mrs. Lucius K. Wilmerding, Miss Josephine Willis, Miss Mary T. Bradley, Miss Genevieve McLean, Mrs. Henry Ziegler, Mrs. Edwin Tatham and Mrs. James Alexander Miller.

Among those who have taken boxes and seats are Miss Mary T. Bradley, Mrs. Louis C. Hay, Miss Angelica Livingston, Mrs. James A. Miller, Miss Blanche Potter, Mrs. Henry Ziegler, Miss Genevieve McLean, Mrs. William Willis Reese, Mrs. Edwin Tatham, Mrs. Lucius Wilmerding, Mrs. William Crittendon Adams, Mrs. Dexter Blagden, Mrs. Jonathan Bulkley, Mrs. Hermann M. Biggs, Mrs. Richard C. Colt, Mrs. James Colby Colgate, Mrs. Charles M. Connfelt, Edwin Gould, Henry K. Goetcbius, Mrs. William L. Harkness, Miss Mary U. Hoffman, Mrs. O'Donnell Iselin, Mrs. Walter James, Mrs. Robert Weeks Kelley, Mrs. Herbert Ten Broeck Jacquelin, Mrs. Robert Jenks, Mrs. Thomas William Lambert, Mrs. Graham Lusk, Mrs. Adrian V. S. Lambert, Mrs. John McChesney, Mrs. Marion MacMillin, Judge Charles C. Nott, Mrs. Joseph Pulitzer, Mrs. Herbert Pratt, Mrs. Roland Redmond, Mrs. George E. Stevens, Mrs. Samuel Sloane, Mrs. John T. Terry, Mrs. Edwin Thorne, Mrs. Howard Whitney, Miss Melissa W. Yuille and Miss Ethel Zabriskie.

OPERA AIDS SOUTHERN SCHOOLS

Proceeds of Matinee Will Be Applied to the Work Of Women's Educational Alliance

PLANS are well under way for the special matinee of "The Jewels of the Madonna" at the Metropolitan Opera House on the afternoon of Dec. 2, to aid the work of the Southern Women's Educational Alliance. A full corps de ballet has been promised for the performance and the leading rôles will be sung by Maria Jeritza, Giovanni Martinelli and Giuseppe Danise.

Mrs. Spencer Waters is chairman of a junior committee, composed largely of young matrons, who are selling boxes and seats at the Opera Headquarters, which has been established at 506 Park Avenue under the direction of Mrs. George R. Boynton, Chairman of the opera committee, and Mrs. Jouett P. Singleton, President of the Southern Women's Educational Alliance. Mrs. Hamilton Rogers is Vice Chairman of the opera committee.

Boxes have been secured by Mrs. Frank E. Hagemeyer, Miss Mary Evelyn Scott Mrs. John E. Barbour, Mrs. E. M. Horne, Mrs. Charles E Van Kleeck, James Madison Austin, Mrs. William R. Simonds, Mrs Claude W. Kress, Mrs. James P. Donahue, Mrs. Frank Mehane, Mr. and Mrs. Clarence Dillon, Mrs. Amos L. Beatty, Mrs. Charles Penn, Mrs. George G. Allen, the Right Rev. and Mrs. Arthur S. SOCIAL ACTIVITIES INCLUDE MANY IN BEHALF OF CHARITY

BENEFITS ARE ARRANGED

Hospitals, the Travelers' Aid and Other Organizations to Be Assisted

In order to raise the necessary funds for the work of the St. Luke's Hospital Social Service Junior Auxiliary, the members of that organization have taken over the Shubert Theatre for the night of Dec. 14 for the matinée performance of "Countess Maritza." In this auxiliary there are more than 100 girls who are in active charge as volunteers in the clinical work of the hospital. From the general funds raised by the auxiliary a worker is paid as well as one who during the Summer has charge of the library. The interesting feature of this supply of reading matter is that the books are wheeled about to the bedsides of the patients.

Mrs. Samuel Walker is President of the auxiliary and Mrs. Robert H. Wills is at the head of the Entertainment Committee. Associated with them as Miss Aloise Boker, Miss Mabel Burdett, Mrs. Philip McMasters, Miss Rosevelt Johnson, Mrs. Philip Parker, Mrs. John Shearer, Miss Jane Watson, Mrs. Duncan Dunscombe, Miss Doris Dodge, Miss Sophie Duer, Miss Patty Vonkoff, Miss Elizabeth Swords, Mrs. Hoskins Coleman, Mrs. F. HISTORIC HARRISON HOME PASSES FROM FAMILY

Famous Virginia Dwelling on James River Changes Owners After 200 Years

For the first time in more than two hundred years, Brandon, one of the most beautiful and best known of the old Virginia estates on the James River, has undergone sale. Save the early part of the eighteenth century the Virginia Harrisons have been "lords of the manor." Its new master is a New Yorker, Robert Daniel, President of the Liberty National Bank, who was born in Virginia and is the great-great-grandson of Edmund Randolph.

The James River woods were once full of Harrisons, and the fame of many of them sounded far beyond the region. One of the family went forth from there to sign the Declaration of Independence and to govern Virginia, another to become President of the United States. Again, in later times, a second President Harrison returned home to pay his respects to illustrious forebears of the name.

Other Family Homes.

William Henry Harrison's home was Berkeley, across the river from Brandon. It was acquired in Colonial days by a brother of the founder of the Brandon branch, and passed out of the family some time before the Civil War. Upper Brandon was another Harrison home, built in the early part of the nineteenth century for a son of the owner of Brandon. It, too, has passed out of Harrison hands, being now owned by Otway Byrd, first cousin of Governor Byrd of Virginia and Commander Richard Byrd.

Of the once extensive Harrison estates along the James, only Brandon has come down in unbroken succession from father to son. Early in the eighteenth century Nathaniel Harrison, a prominent figure in Colonial history, acquired the holding, the history of which as white man's territory dates from a royal grant to Captain John Martin in 1616, a document the present day Harrisons preserve. Under storms of war and hard times few of the Old South's fine homes present such a record. Particularly is this true of the James River neighborhood. Here yachts of plutocrats from many parts of the country have long since found their way. In their wake, estate after estate has changed hands. Especially Westover—possibly the most famous of all as the home of the beautiful Evelyn Byrd, who died romantically of a broken heart—is weathered by the experience of passing owners. But for Brandon, heir to many of the family treasures and traditions of Westover after it went on the market, the adventure of sale is something new in two centuries of change.

The Beauty of Brandon.

Brandon is embowered and hidden in luxuriant trees. Every flower and shrub known to Virginia, it is said, blooms in its famous Colonial gardens. A broad lawn stretches in front of the house, which peeps here and there through its magnolia screen. Like most of the houses of its time, Brandon faces two ways. From one broad, white-pillared porch it looks out on the oval of sky and river at the end of the wooded vista; from the other it peers into a tangle of beeches, horse chestnuts and water oaks, where the deep shadows of noonday create the dusk twilight. Like open arms, the double mansion extends its rectangular wings at the ends of long, low corridors. The centre building—its square hall graced with a triple arch supported by fluted Ionic columns, and a sweeping stairway—was designed by Thomas Jefferson, who roomed at William and Mary College with the Harrison who built it. It dates before 1788. The wings of glazed brick from England are much older. Nobody knows just when they were built, but it is thought the oldest was put up about 1712. Far older than any part of the house is an iron-shuttered brick building of small dimensions with the marks of loopholes on its massive walls. Tradition calls it the "block house." There, it is said, many a colonist found refuge from Indians on the war path.

Many Presidents Visited.

Brandon thought nothing in its heyday of putting up a score of visitors for the night. All of the Presidents down to Franklin Pierce, according to its annals, were entertained there at one time or other. The visitors' book was a pane of glass beside the front door, whereon distinguished guests cut their names with a diamond. This pane vanished when the house was ransacked by General Butler's troops in the Civil War. Other wars had already sent their squadrons up the James and their soldiers across Brandon's fields. Benedict Arnold burnt outhouses and slaughtered cattle there, and the British General Phillips came that way en route to Petersburg. The War of 1812 left its trace on the river-front bricks, which today appear pock-marked with shot and shell.

House Saved by Lincoln.

The house was spared total destruction in 1864 by the intervention of President Lincoln. Before the troops had time to go back to Brandon, as they had planned, and finish the job, a wire from Washington stopped them. But already large patches of the parlor paneling had been stripped off in the search for plate and treasure. The valuables of Brandon, however, had been bundled off by the women folk fleeing to Richmond.

Many of Brandon's most prized possessions came from Westover with Evelyn Taylor Byrd, niece of the famous Evelyn, and bride of a Harrison. There was the Westover Manuscript, written on fine parchment in engraver-like script and, for all its age, still much alive with Colonel Byrd's vivacious style. There was the pink and blue brocaded gown, with quilted skirt and Watteau pleat, in which the "beauty of the James" had been presented at the Court of George I; also her little fan and her portrait by Godfrey Kneller. In Brandon's gallery was also the portrait of the Duke of Argyle, and pictures of Elizabeth Claypoole, "Lady Betsy," Oliver Cromwell's daughter, and one of Daniel Parke, who, as bearer of the tidings of Blenheim to Queen Anne, requested her likeness instead of the usual gold reward.

When the women returned to Brandon after the Civil War, they brought these treasures back again. There they remained—the ghosts of departed splendor; for the blight of wartime reverses did not lift from the home of the Harrisons. But its fine old spirit of thoroughbred gentility clung to the impoverished walls.

Gradually, much of the estate passed out of the Harrisons' hands, here a tract of pasture and there a field or two, and the house itself fell into general disrepair. The day that sees it passing from the direct line of the founder, however, also sees the bright promise of restoration to former grandeur. Brandon will be repaired and modernized. But the new owner says that not a trace of its old-time charm will be removed—not a bullet hole will be puttied up, not a frill will be added. And Brandon's bride-ghost need have no fear of losing her way as she floats into the parlor at midnight—in search of her little gold wedding ring, hung on the chandelier so long ago that no one knows how or why it came there.

Beauty for the Teacher

By Helena Rubinstein
International Beauty Specialist

A NEW type of feminine pedagogue has come into existence—the chic, well-groomed, good-looking instructress! This modern teacher realizes that beauty is not necessarily a natural endowment. Sun, wind, dust, indoor air and the outdoor elements, all conspire to wreak havoc with the skin. The secret of real beauty lies in daily care. Even five minutes a day, correctly spent, will prevent sallowness, enlarged pores, blackheads, surface blemishes, and will soften signs of age.

I am happy to recommend a scientific beauty regimen, which I am sure will appeal to teachers, as a class—and to every woman who values her youth and beauty!

The basis of beauty

VALAZE PASTEURIZED FACE CREAM—revitalizes the cells and tissues—molds out "tired look"—coaxes out all impurities and keeps the complexion smooth, protected, healthy. Unsurpassed for all normal skins, this unique cream is also positively beneficial to oily, irritated or acne blemished skins. Excellent as a foundation for make-up. (4 oz. 1.00, ½ lb. 2.00, lb. 3.50.)

VALAZE CLEANSING AND MASSAGE CREAM—particularly recommended for dry, sensitive skins, alternating it with the Pasteurized Cream every other night—ideal for quick removal of dust and makeup. (75c, 1.25)

For greatest skin perfection
VALAZE BEAUTIFYING SKIN-FOOD—apply, after cleansing with either of the above creams. Lightens the skin, gradually bleaching away sallowness, tan, freckles. Refines the texture, creating an alluring delicacy. (1.00, 2.50)

Whenever you feel fatigued
VALAZE SKIN-TONING LOTION—put this healing beauty lotion all over face. This refreshes, cleanses the skin, and tones up the tissues, preventing flabbiness, and softening indications of age. Also keeps pores invisible. (1.25)

Safety first—in cosmetics
For intensely flattering touches of beauty—absolutely free from harmful cosmetics—use the exquisite Valaze powders, rouges, lipsticks, mascara and other make-up preparations scientifically compounded by Helena Rubinstein.

Individual Beauty Service
You are invited to visit the enclosed rooms of Helena Rubinstein—for an expert diagnosis of your individual beauty needs. Advice is given on the correction of open pores, coarse hair, drooping chin, blackheads and all facial blemishes.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR ON TOPICS IN THE NEWS

MAJORITY PRINCIPLE IS HELD TO DELAY WORLD AGREEMENT

Concurrent Voting, It Is Argued, Would Provide for The Selection of Impartial Arbitrators in Disputes Between Nations

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Louis J. Lewis states in his letter to THE TIMES that "the League of Nations is no longer an infant; the World Court is now matured; the Disarmament Conference is a living memory; round-table discussions are regular events, and yet satisfactory world agreement still hangs in the balance. Why?" The following is, I believe, the answer.

Elihu Root, when he was Secretary of State, in his instructions to our delegate to The Hague Peace Conference in 1907 said: "There can be no donht that the principal objection to arbitration rests, not upon the unwillingness of nations to submit their controversies to impartial arbitration, bnt upon an apprehension that the arbitration to which they submit may not be impartial."

One of the principal reasons why satisfactory world agreements still hang in the balance is, I believe, due to the principle of majority voting. An examination of this principle, on which all voting methods so far have been based, shows that it does not permit a selection of impartial arbitrators or officials. By it an official or an arbitrator is made entirely subject to the will of the majority. That is, the fact that his selection depends on a majority places him in a position where, in his own interest, he must be partial to that majority. And as the majority and the minority represent the two sides of a dispnte, this makes impartiality out of the question.

Whatever consideration is given to the rights of the minority by the majority is not due to any legal compulsion, but to a feeling that the majority is morally obliged to give it.

Is it any wonder then, where the principle of majority voting is operative, that men and nations hesitate to submit important questions to arbitration? The principle of majority voting works all right where the questions to be decided are not important; but where the reverse is the case men are tempted to, and do, forget their moral obligations.

Another important reason: To get around the evils of majority voting the principle of unanimous consent is advocated. Unanimous consent is equally as bad as that of majority rule. It gives a veto power that makes it possible for one nation to block all action, which can easily result in evils just as detrimental as those due to majority rule.

Plainly, we need something different from majority voting or unanimous consent as a means of deciding questions. I believe concurrent voting solves the problem. Concurrent means: acting in union or conjunction; joint and equal in authority; meeting at one point.

In concurrent voting we vote for one-half the number running—the least majority. By causing the voters to vote for the least majority we force them to agree on some one candidate. This method would give us impartial officials and arbitrators. It would give an individual or nation enough veto power to protect his or its rights, but not so great as to make it a means of transgressing on the rights of others.

With concurrent voting in use we would not need supermen to make things go. WILLIAM CROCKER.

EDUCATIONAL MOTION PICTURES

To the Editor of The New York Times:

As one who has followed with particular interest the value of the motion picture as an educational means, I wish to comment upon the views of "Apostle of Visual Education" and to add the following suggestions:

Any projected illustration before an audience is at the most a momentary or passing impression, unless the view is permitted to remain upon the screen and at the same time commented upon by the teacher or the speaker. It is a fact that, due to the multiplicity of the films now being exhibited in places of amusement, the mind of the average person is becoming trained to forget, considering the picture only as a means of entertainment for the moment. There are exceptions to this rule, hnt in general that is the fact, and THE TIMES's correspondent therefore seems to favor the stereopticon slide projector as a means of education, and also because of its greater simplicity and lower cost.

However, it is not necessary to invest $1,000 in motion-picture projection apparatus for a classroom, because simpler and less expensive projectors are available which are also provided with means for stopping and viewing as a still picture any individual view of a motion-picture film.

This system permits the lecturer to impress upon his audience such views as may require further attention in order to link vision with hearing, so that both of these vital senses may become active in registering and impressing upon the memory the specific and desired effect. In this method the pupil or audience is not permitted to form individual conception of the act.

There is now being conducted much research work in the field of teaching with motion-picture film. This is a vast problem on account of the difference in the method and language of teaching the same subjects to pupils in the different States, cities and counties; hut the problem seems to be in competent hands, and with the cooperation of boards of education there should be no difficulty or fear about the practical outcome. Furthermore, the new and modern system of film projection for schools would include fireproof film and projectors of very high efficiency, operating without special electrical connections or fireproof enclosures. It is safe to say that the cost of a complete installation, excepting the film, would not exceed a few hundred dollars.

The possibility of such a motion-picture system for educational purposes is beyond the comprehension of the average person, especially when certain subjects are considered, such as hiology, physiology, hygiene, history and geography, and possibly mathematics and geometry. Some of these subjects are generally uninteresting to the younger pupil, hut by means of proper motion pictures they can be made intensely interesting and understandable, and there is no doubt that this phase of visual education will be considered in planning any future program.

RACHEL'S TRIUMPH RECALLED

To the Editor of The New York Times:

In the theatrical section of the recent Old New York Exhibition attention was attracted to the steel engraving of Rachel, bearing her autograph and date, New York, 1855.

The coming to this country of this renowned French actress was a theatrical event of the first magnitude. In fact, she was the first great foreign actress to cross the Atlantic. The opening night was Sept. 3, 1855; the theatre was the Metropolitan, on Broadway near Bond Street, then one of the fashionable quarters of the town. The play was "Les Horaces," Rachel impersonating Camille, being the same rôle in which she had made her débnt eighteen yeare before at the Comédie Française.

Describing Rachel's performance one of the reviewers wrote: "She acts down to her fingertips. Her thin and fragile figure seeme to shrink and qniver from the effect of passione which seem to excite her, hut which, in fact, only have that effect on the audience. Even those who were altogether ignorant of the French language were in raptures. Rachel's pantomime is more eloquent than the words of an ordinary actress. Her face is not handsome hut expressive. The writer has seen a great many theatrical performances and a great deal of what is called good acting. The Camille of Rachel is the only piece of great acting he has ever seen."

As to the audience, the same writer remarked: "Never has been of late years such a turnout of old theatregoers. Not even Jenny Lind attracted such a concouree. Two-thirds of the audience were men; why the ladies stayed away was not explained. Perhaps they were kept away by the wicked stories abont Rachel; hut they will come yet." The price for the best seats was $3. "Scholars may admire Corneille and Racine," was said editorially, "but not to the extent of $3 for a single admission."

OUR OUT-OF-JOINT TIMES

To the Editor of The New York Times:

A good deal of pretentious, precious nonsense is being published about the "youth movement," "youth's challenge to age," "age's challenge to youth," and the glorification and apotheosis of youth in general. Our forefathers knew better than to talk this way. They used to take youth over their knee and spank it. If youth had attempted to "challenge" our stern old Puritan forebears, youth would have been invited out to the woodshed and would have been compelled to take its meals from the mantelpiece for some days to come. We think that "we are the people, and wisdom will die with us," but we forget that it is necessary at times to argue with youth with a stick (argumentum ad baculum).

Recently a friend presented me with a copy of a book written by her pastor. I took time to read it, but thought my time largely wasted until I came across this phrase near the end of the book: "Our demoralized and mystified society high and low." I considered that that phrase repaid me for the time I had spent upon this otherwise rather unfruitful book.

The age is completely demoralized. It has broken away from all the eound, sober, moral and ethical teaching of the past and has eubstituted for this teaching new and untried ethical theories that have been advanced and eponsored by the new, raw men of our day. Jeremiah referred to us as well as to his own people when he said: "They have * * * hewed them out cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water." Our age is also completely mystified—at any rate it is completely mystified in the fields of religion, morale and manners.

ARE BRIDES NO LONGER TRUE TO "THE FALLS"?

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Time was when no bride, in planning her wedding trip, would think of leaving Niagara Falls out of the itinerary. A visit to thie wonder of the world was almost a part of the marriage ceremony.

Nowadaye most brides seem to prefer Europe, Florida or one of the more pretentious resorts. Several I have talked with recently seemed surprised when I asked them if they were going to Niagara Falls.

Probably I am getting old and behind the times, but even though I lived for several years within the sound of the cataract, the Falls still have a fascination for me.

VOTERS' HANDBOOK TO AID ELECTORS

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Now that election is over, I wonld like to ask a question. Am I the only stupid or foolish voter who votes for candidates I don't know, never heard about or what their platforms are?

It is true that one who reads the newspapers gets a fair idea about some of the candidates. Bnt how about the little fellows—those who are not running for Governor or President or Senator?

The average campaign orator only makes a noise to obliterate the real intelligent issues. Mud-throwing is gradnally dying out, and so is the "het-up" newspaper talk. We are getting to a more intelligent method of voting—little by little. But I would still like to know for whom to vote when I do go to the polls. I offer these suggestions:

1. When registration time comes paid notices to be placed in all newspapers. Also all registered last year's voters to be notified hy mail to register again. Also cardboard posters hung on all prominent corners to remind people to register.

2. All registered voters shonld receive by mail, or at the time of registering, a booklet about all candidates and questions to be voted on, and containing pictures of the candidates.

By reading this booklet the voters could obtain fairly accurate knowledge of each candidate, his platform and ideas, and could form from a study of the portrait a fair idea of the type of man he is. JOSEPH J. CLARICH.

Brooklyn, Nov. 8, 1926.

THOUGHTS ON MEETINGS.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The other evening a friend and I stopped for a moment in the lobby of a theatre at the close of the program. One of Europe's leading musicians had scored a tremendous hit. He had played several encores. The audience had gone "wild."

The people as they left the theatre seemed unanimous in the wish that they could meet the artist. "Have you ever met him?" seemed on almost every tongue. "Oh if I conld only meet him, learn something of his personality—what it is that makes him play like that!"

The thought that passed through my mind was this: How many times have we desired to meet the engineer of a train after a speedy and safe transcontinental trip? How many times have we tried to meet the ship's captain after the liner has plowed safely through the storm?

Then the vision cams to me of the Carpenter Boy of Nazareth, and I wondered how many in the theatre throng had met Him, had thanked Him for the success of their own dramas—or are they waiting for the end of the program?

TRAINMEN'S WAGE DEMANDS ARE TERMED UNWARRANTED

Faults in Arguments Pointed Out by a Workingman Who Looks for a Decrease Soon in the Compensation of Workers in the Building Trades

To the Editor of The New York Times:

At a recent hearing by the first Board of Arbitration under the Watson-Parker law of the demand made by the railroad trainmen for a 20 per cent. increase in wages Mr. Craig, a conductor, testified that if he worked steadily he could earn $295 a month. He further stated that his absence from home meant an additional expense for four meals and 60 cents for lodging. Other expenses included two uniforms a year costing $43 each, and $3.25 for a cap. Mr. Craig inferred that these expenditures were hurdensome and offered them as one of his reasons for an increase in wages.

The meals eaten away from home are not extra meals, but four regular meals eaten outside of his own home. If he were able to eat the meals at home they would cost him something. Eaten in a restaurant, they cost a little more. All of us have that same condition to contend with. We cannot take all of our meals in our own homes, so in this item he is no worse off than any other workingman.

His next item, lodging, is an additional expense, hnt so small that it is hardly worth considering.

His third item, uniforms and cap, by no stretch of the imagination should be considered an added expense. If Mr. Craig did not wear a uniform, he would have to wear an ordinary hnsiness suit, which would cost him just as much as a uniform. Instead of wearing a hat he wears a cap, which costs abont the same. In reference to the two uniforms a year, this is a rule which is rarely lived up to.

Now we come to another, and one of the chief reasons advanced for an increase in wages. It is that the wages paid to railroad trainmen have not kept pace with the wages paid in other trades, the building line being particularly specified. While I shall not argue this point, I will say, as a workingman, that the wages paid in nearly all hranches of the building line are too high, and I look for a considerable reduction in the not very distant future.

I contend that if Mr. Craig can earn $295 a month working steadily, he is paid sufficient salary to live on comfortably, and when we consider that a very large percentage of these men own their homes, for which they should be commended, they are, therefore, free from the hurdensome condition of high rents which the ordinary workman is compelled to endure.

Now we have another factor to be considered, and that is that the high cost of living has ehown a gradual decline, and this has become more pronounced since 1925. This statement is verified and supported hy Irving Fisher, Professor of Economics in Yale University.

It seems strange to me that when this organized labor body demands an increase totaling $38,000,000 a year there is no organization of farmers, salesmen or other industries and trade to protest. But let the railroads apply for permission to increase freight, passenger or commutation rates, and all three of these interested bodies rise in organized protest against the move.

It may be a mooted question whether or not the railroads can absorb this tremendous increase in wages without getting an increase in their schedules. If the railroads should get an increase in their rates, who then pays for the increase in wages? It does not need the brain of an Irving Fisher to answer this. In conclusion, I would like to direct the attention of the commission which is hearing this demand for a 20 per cent. increase, as well as the 80,000 employes of the railroads, to a report hy the National Catholic Welfare Association which appeared in THE NEW YORK TIMES of Nov. 3. A careful perusal of this report by these two bodies will, to say the least, be very illuminating.

MARTIN J. MALONE.

New York, Nov. 10, 1926.

THE SHORT WORKING WEEK

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I read with interest THE TIMES account of the State Industrial Survey Commission session relative to the question of the forty-eight-honr week for women.

The industry with which I am identified is one which encompasses leather work such as is done hy Mrs. Whitehouse, who has appeared before the commission in advocating something still more progressive, namely, the forty-hour week.

In justice to the leather industry, I might mention at this point that the forty-four-honr week was really not introdnced by Mrs. Whitehouse, but was created by mutual consent between the representatives of labor and the representatives of the manufacturers' association back in 1922.

Since that time the forty-four-hour week has been in force in the leather goods industry in this city, with an optional provision for the distrihution of these forty-four hours over five days or six days. Within the past few years, however, most manufacturers have eliminated the Saturday work and confined the forty-four hours of operation to the five weekdays throughout the year, with the exception of the heavy season, which usually does require overtime prodnction. For this overtime the employes are paid in excess of their normal rate.

The ourtailment of houre in this particular industry is a vital matter and cannot be dealt with as lightly as Mrs. Whitehouse has attempted to handle it. If Mrs. Whitehouse, as she says, operates a plant where ehe employs approximately eighty persons, and if Mre. Whitehouse, as ehe contends, has been confronted in her attempt to market her merchandise with competition of an unscrupulous nature, it would seem nnfair to point to her particular example as being sufficiently indicative of the merits of such a plan as ehe advocates. There are many manufacturers in this industry who enjoy enviable records in successful operation over a period of years who do not share her experience when it comes to competition. Her reference, therefore, to driving competition is irrelevant and immaterial in the general discussions of hours and wages. Quality, not hours, often determines price.

There are industries undonbtedly that demand more human energy than that in which even Mrs. Whitehouse is engaged end where perhaps more leisure and greater recreation may be necessary. But legislation covering the field of labor generally would be harmful from a productive standpoint unless certain industries of a lighter nature are excluded.

EARLY CUP OF COFFEE PLEASES A TRAVELER

To the Editor of The New York Times:

On the through trains to the South the custom is observed of serving a small cup of black coffee as soon as the traveler takes his seat for breakfast in the dining car. Apparently this service is "on the house," so to speak, because no charge for it appears in the bill.

I do not know how the custom originated, but I always appreciate that little cup of coffee early in the morning. Incidentally it pleases me to feel that I am getting eomething for nothing, whether or not that is the case. I wonder why the Northern railroads do not serve it? H. R. HOWARD.

ART IN SAVANNAH HAS FITTING HOME

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The writer of the article "The Aspiring Soul of the South" must be woefully ignorant of the fact that in the City of Savannah there is, and for forty years has been, an art gallery containing a collection of modern paintings second to no small collection in this country, and easily the first in quality, perhaps even numerically, in the South. The Telfair Academy of Arts and Sciences is well known to artists throughout this country. It has upon its walls the works of such men as Melchers, Childe Hassam, Metcalf, Bellows, Redfield, Frieseke, Jonas Lie, Henri, Shannon, Hitchcock, Hawthorne, Brangwyn, Besnard, La Touche and very many others of the same class, including quite an extensive group of French and English painters.

In the old Colonial drawing room of this once dignified and characteristic Southern home, is a rare collection of old furniture—Flemish, English, Italian and French periods are beautifully represented. The old dining room of Colonial and Empire furniture also contains a rare Heppelwhite sideboard. The two early American basement kitchens, with the original flagstone flooring, brick oven and fireplaces still showing the original cranes hung with copper kettles, &c., have been recently restored and filled with old utenells, making it one of the most complete kitchen museums to be found anywhere. REMINDERS OF CONFLICT.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Is the meaning of the Armistice Day clear to all of the American public? Evidently not. Certain movies took advantage of the Armistice Week to review some war pictures presented under the title "Lest We Forget."

It seems piteously tragic that what appeals to a few petty, feelingless persons should be allowed to bring to life the memory of an agony dead for years. Upon its tombstone was the epitaph "Let's Forget." Is it going to be changed to "Gone hnt Not Forgotten"? With each succeeding anniversary to remind the public of what was hurled, the dead will come back to life once more.

To forget, however, is not so easily done as said. It represents negative action. A positive measure will be, as was stated hy a number of persons, to work concretely to the realization of peace. This measure involves a large program. A small program, however, may do as well in rearticulating the meaning of the armistice anniversary. One small and simple feature of the day should be a bonfire of all the war films. Once that perpetual reminder is removed, the dead past may take care to bury its own dead. DOROTHY WONG.

G. A. R. PROPOSES LINCOLN MUSEUM

AN Abraham Lincoln and Civil War museum may he set np on the spot where President Lincoln was shot hy John Wilkes Booth on the night of April 14, 1865. A movement with that objective has been started by leaders in the Grand Army of the Republic. They are pressing the suggestion on the authorities in Washington, where obliteration of all that survives of the immediate eurroundings of the assassination is threatened.

The stable behind the old theatre structure in which the assassination took place was sold recently by the Government. Booth rented the stable from its owner, before his attack on Lincoln, retaining it even after he had ceased to keep his horee there.

Government authorities have been thinking seriously of selling the remainder of the old Ford Theatre property, which was acquired hy Congress after the assassination of Lincoln to prevent its further use for show purposes. If sold, all that remains of the old etructure would probably be removed to make way for modern improvements.

Old Interior Torn Out.

The stable alone eurvives intact. It has been used ecarcely at all since Booth rented it. Only the front wall of the theatre survives. It remains as it was when erected originally as the façade of a Baptist church.

Henry J. Ford türned the original structure into a theatre during the Civil War, when it became Washington's leading playhouse. Most of the eminent actors and actresses of the time appeared on its stage. John Wilkes Booth and his famous brother, Edwin Booth, played there many times. After the tragedy Edwin Booth never again appeared in any theatre in Washington.

On June 9, 1893, the day Edwin Booth was buried in Boston, a second tragedy occurred in the old building. While repairs were being made, the interior of the building collapsed on more than a hundred workmen. Twenty-two men were killed and sixty-eight injured.

The interior structure was then torn away and a new one erected. It bears no resemblance to that which was there at the time of Lincoln's assassination, although the front wall, rising flush from the sidewalk, is the same. Since the Government acquired it in 1865 the building has been used chiefly as a storehouse, for, in the main, old records. Since the World War, the fingerprint records of the A. E. F. have been preserved there.

G. A. R. Suggests Reconetruction.

Army engineers say that the building is unsafe and suggest that it be sold. Grand Army leaders contend, however, that it ehould be preserved as fully as possible. So they are urging the Government to refrain from selling it and to rehuild the interior of the etructure for use as a museum.

Colonel John McElroy, editor of The National Tribune, the G. A. R. publication; Captain O. H. Oldroyd, former owner of the Oldroyd collection of Lincolniana; Captain John Middleton and Captain J. F. Young have taken the lead in the movement for preservation.

They propose that the Oldroyd collection, recently purchased, be moved from the old residence in which Lincoln died, across the street from the Ford Theatre, and be displayed in the theatre property. The collection, they say, is too large for good display in the old residence. Moreover, it will be difficult, if not impossible, to make the old residence fireproof.

That property also is owned hy the Government. The G. A. R. veterans think it would be better to maintain it as nearly as possible as it was when Lincoln died there. They would have it fitted up with furniture of the sort that was there when the dying President was taken into the house.

Additions to the Oldroyd collection may be numerous. For example, the bed on which Lincoln died still exists. It is in the possession of the Chicago Historical Society, whose officers, it is said, have stated that ehould the Government arrange to display it with proper protection, the society would be glad to return it to Washington. It was purchased soon after the assassination hy a collector whose son sold it to the society. The original owner received $500 for it.

The Government possessee, aside from the Oldroyd collection, several relics of the assassination of Lincoln. One is the flag that draped the box in which the President was sitting when Booth attacked him. It shows the tear made hy Booth's spur when caught in it as the assassin leaped from the box. The mischance caueed Booth to suffer a broken leg as he fell on the stage. It is the only one of the Government's relics of the affair that has been kept on public display. It is in a glass showcase in the Treasury hnilding.

In the War Department's archives are the revolver Booth used, the hullet fired from it into the President's head, the diary kept by the assassin while fleeing and several photographs of women which were in his coat pocket when he was killed hy pursuers.

Offer of Civil War Mementoes.

"In the National Museum, the Library of Congress and elsewhere, the Government has put on display relics having to do with the lives of many famous Americans," says Colonel McElroy who heads the informal committee of veterane that is trying to have the old Ford Theatre property preserved for museum use. "But barring the flag that tells the story of Booth's fall when leaping out of the box at the theatre, the Government has displayed almost no relics having to do with the Civil War President. If adequate display roome were provided, we are confident that many persons would surrender their Lincoln relics to be added to those of the Government and those of the collection it has taken over from Captain Oldroyd.

"Lincoln is certainly a hig and interesting enough figure for a public museum to be set up for mementoes of him alone at the national capital. The one we suggest might be made, however, a museum of the Civil War period as well as of relica of the Great Emancipator."

Captain Oldroyd has offered to donate his miscellaneous Civil War collection in case the Ford Theatre is preserved as a museum. This collection, which he brought together as a side line while he was giving more than a half century of his life to the gathering of Lincolniana, is large. Even before and during the Civil War, throughout which he served in the army, Captain Oldroyd put aside everything he thought would be of future interest. In the collection are thousands of clippings from newspapers and periodicals, and autographed pictures of practically every general officer who eerved in both the Union and Confederate forces, also many letters written by persons prominent at the time.

RADIO FOR JAUNT.

UPON request of the Smithsonian Institution the Secretary of War has authorized the issue of two army radio sets for the use of the expedition which is being sent jointly by the National Geographic Society and the Smithsonian into Southwest Africa to observe the radiation of the sun. The army sets are easily portable and are operated by a motor generator run by a small storage battery.

MISINFORMATION IN MEXICO PLENTIFUL AND EASY TO GET

Many Writers Are Biased, According to a Traveler, Who Takes Occasion to Dispute the Locale of The Hanging of Nine Peons

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The dispatch in THE TIMES telling how the Mexican Government arrested Mr. De Conrcey, thinking him to be the author of Sydney Sutherland's "The Machete vs. the Cross" articles now appearing in Liberty Magazine was mighty interesting.

Most of the articles on Mexico seem to be the ontcome of a short visit, usually to Mexico City; are decidedly biased hy pre-existing opinions and lack real authentic information. A good many of them are first impressions. Mexico City may be the real Mexico, the "Second Paris," as far as color is concerned, hut to know Mexico City only is to have hnt a very poor conception of the country as a whole.

With all due respect to Sydney Sutherland, in spite of the fact that he has epent a goodly portion of hie life in Mexico, I am of the opinion that he was prejudiced before he inquired into the present religious situation, and I know that he was a little hasty in accepting at least one of the incidents he mentions as authentic. I refer to his first article, where he showe a picture of nine peons hanging from a tree, explaining that the event took place in front of the Catholic church in the little village of Jalisquillo, State of Nayarit. The story goes that the Federal soldiers picked the nine victims at random after they were unable to find the man who had murdered a Deputy named Moreno the day before. Moreno had attempted to confiscate some church property and the members of the church objected.

It so happens that when in Mexico my headquarters are in Tepic, the capital of Nayarit, and every time I make the trip to the mine, which is about once in every two weeks, I pass through Jalisquillo, usually stopping there for breakfast. I remember when Moreno was killed; it was in April of this year; in fact, a Mexican friend of mine—was with Moreno at the time—and a day or two later he told me the whole story while he lay in bed suffering several knife wounds received in the same fight.

If any hangings took place in front of the Jalisquillo church I never heard of them. I do know that the picture used hy Mr. Sutherland to illustrate his story is in reality a photograph of a hanging which took place on the road from Tepic to Jalisquillo more than two years ago. The American who took that section call it the "Christmas Tree." The victims were beaten and tortured by Federal soldiers and hanged on the spot. I have had a copy of the same photograph for over a year.

In Mexico it is very easy to obtain plenty of misinformation. In many cases it is easier to build a story around a picture and then find one's point than to find a picture to go with a true story. If Mr. Sutherland's aim is to truthfully inform the American public of existing conditions in Mexico, as he says, free from any biased viewpoint, he should be more careful to publish only facts he knows to be absolutely true or from reliable sources. It is very easy to leave the wrong impression.

In his last article, which appeared in the Nov. 6 issue, Mr. Sutherland, in my opinion, is decidedly unfair when they didn't like it.

CONCERNING WORLD ORIGIN

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The TIMES tells of a Berlin scientist who on the basis of temperature measurements throws doubt on the hypothesis that the earth is a "giant drop become detached from the monster globe of the sun." The tendency to attribute all scientific discoveries to Germany leads me to ask that you publish the following brief excerpt from a paper hy Professor H. L. Fairchild of the University of Rochester:

"An example of innate conservatism, in science instead of religion, is found in the tenacity with which even scientific men are holding to a discredited hypothesis of world origin. It is now one-quarter of a centnry since Professor T. C. Chamberlain, with the cooperation of Professor F. R. Moulton, proved that the nebular or Laplacian hypothesis for the evolntion of the solar system fails at all points where it is tested hy modern physical science. With the passing of the old philosophy—for the nebular cosmogenic guess was more philosophy than science—there should be abandoned the involved conception of an originally molten globe. This conception has alwaye been a hindrance to geologic science, because most of the difficult problems in geology make the final appeal to the manner of formation, or to the initial condition, of the globe.

"Instead of an initial and incandescent globe of full size, the planetesimal theory, by Professor Chamberlain, builds the earth by the slow process of accretion of cold particles (planetesimals), with the surface of the growing globe always solid and relatively cold. This new conception offers a better basis and a more satisfactory explanation for the elastic rigidity of earth science."

Professor Fairchild then points to a deadly parallel of twenty-one problems in geology, to which Chamberlain's theory gives satisfactory answers, while Laplace's theory fails.

Besides, one who reads the recent work on the pressure theory of the cause of solar heat, and who knows that a dark attendant of matter, if I recall correctly, has no light of its own that a few cubic inches weigh over a ton, must look askance at the Laplacian scientist's argument that the earth's core is iron and solid matter, as we know it, is widely spread in space, and P. W. Bridgman of Harvard has shown what occurs when we subject it to the great hut comparatively powerless pressures we can secure in our laboratories. We hardly know what happens with such enormous pressures as exist in the centre of the earth or of the sun, hut it must be something unusual and may result in molecular or atomic changes with the release of energy. TINKERING WITH THE TARIFF

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Our tariffs since the Civil War with the exception of certain schedules in the badly mauled downward revisions, have been excessive. That includes the widest reasonable extension of the protective tariff idea. The policy of protection has been supported by many different and often conflicting arguments.

Hamilton, in his famous Report on Manufactures, puts forward the "infant industries" idea. This, which persisted for many years as the sole basis for protection, was embodied in a tariff that averaged about 8 to 10 per cent. on a small list of manufactures. The subsidy, paid hy the consumer, frankly admitted to be such, was to continue during a brief period only. This, too, was in a period of real infant industries in this country.

After years of up-and-down tariff revisions, we came into very moderate schedules in the so-called Walker tariff of the 1840s. The Civil War upset the basis of that universally accepted and successful act, under which manufactures and commerce, domestic and foreign, greatly flourished. So, too, the World War upset the Underwood tariff, with its really high rates, absurdly called by sky-high protectionists and partisans "free trade."

Now the Fordney-McCumber act of 1922 is in operation, with rates in excess, in the important manufactures, of the overwhelmingly repudiated Payne-Aldrich bill. The latter split the Republican Party directly to the Presidential results of 1912.

The pressing question now is: Shall we have "free trade," or shall we enact a tariff of moderate rates of customs duties so as to permit normal international commerce and healthy finance? Thus only can we find a steady foreign market for the vast and rapidly increasing surplus of manufactures and agricultural products. Thus only can Europe pay even the interest on our enormous foreign debt and liquidate gradually a portion of the principal. Thus only the wages of labor suffer in the long run. Expanding prodnction and open markets produce an ever-increasing demand for labor and, inevitably, a rising wage scale.

VIEWS ON PROHIBITION

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I read in THE TIMES that J. St. Loe Strachey, editor of The Spectator, in his latest book, "American Soundings," had written of the effects of the Eighteenth Amendment as they impressed the intelligent foreign visitor. In THE TIMES Book Review I read reviews of the new books on the same subject hy Professor Irving Fisher and D. Leigh Colvin. Endeavoring to get at the truth of this question, perhaps the most important confronting this nation today, I procured and read assiduously all three volumes.

As your critic well said, both Messrs. Fisher and Colvin show emotional bias. But Mr. Strachey, in "American Soundings," is apparently free from that handicap. If I were directing the fight against the amendment, it is the Strachey argument, detached from personal interest, that I would stress.

In any event all such books, doubtless forerunners of many volumes to this discussion, indicate that we are soon to have careful analysis of one radical American experiment of prohibition—perhaps the most radical ever taken by any nation in the field of economic or sociological growth.

HELPFUL BROADCASTING.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Freeman Hopwood's plan for a university of the air might prove helpful to a few bookworms, but it would not appeal to the masses. I talked with him concerning "jazz and the air," but if he will study the radio programs of today I am sure he will find much that will appeal to him. What always has real music to offer to poisonous jazz.

LIFE OF OLD TURNPIKE REVIVED BY MOTOR CAR

Great Western Road From Albany to Buffalo, Once State's Main Artery, Awakened After Years of Disuse

By JOHN SAWYER.

VIEWING the magnificent highway system of New York State today, it is worth while to remember that at the close of the Revolution there was only one road in the territory west of Albany that could properly be called a highway. This ran from Albany to Schenectady, between which the Indians had cut a trail more than a hundred years before. In the following years the trail had developed into a fairly good dirt and gravel road.

Beyond Schenectady the road became little more than a trail, the only settlers traveling in canoes and bateaux on the Mohawk River. This had an rude road, extended as far west as Fort Stanwix, but beyond the point where Mt. Johnsville now stands it was passable only on horseback, or on foot. A rough road led from the vicinity to Johnstown, which before the Revolution was the home of Sir William Johnson, the Indian agent of the English Government. A similar road led from the Mohawk to what was known as the Cherry Valley settlements.

From Albany a trail that had developed into the semblance of a road led to the early Palatine settlements in the Schoharie Valley. Minor trails, which could hardly be designated as roads, led to isolated small settlements and General Sullivan on his expedition against the Indians in 1779, had cut a military road from the Mohawk to Otsego Lake. This constituted the highway system of the State, west of Albany, at the close of the Revolution. Soon after the war ended there was a exodus from the more thickly settled sections of New England and the East to the almost unknown West, which continued for nearly a century. By 1799 the traffic had become so great that a charter was granted for the building of the Great Western Turnpike; the first of those great arteries of travel which carried the traffic of the East to the new lands of the West. The charter authorized the building of a turnpike, "Running from the City of Albany to the tavern of John Walton, in the village of Cherry Valley." The latter village, with a population of 600, was at that time the largest and most important town west of Schenectady. Syracuse, Rochester and Buffalo, as well as the cities of the west, were unknown, except as one or two instances as small trading posts.

Building Great Western Turnpike.

The following year a charter was granted for the continuation of the Great Western Turnpike to Skaneateles Lake, and two years later it was completed through to Buffalo—then only coming into being as a small lake port. The building of this broad highway, a distance of 280 miles, was one of the greatest achievements in the early history of the State. The surveying and grading were, however, of the simplest kind. For the greater part of the distance the road ran pretty as straight as an arrow. No attempt was made to establish grades but to wind around the hills. In fact, hilly roads were considered an advantage, since the Spring and Fall rains made the lowlands impassable.

This was the main reason why the through traffic went over the western turnpike instead of along the more level Mohawk Valley. Corduroy roads, made by placing logs side by side, were built over the low places. Remains of these log roads, nearly a century old, were dug up three years ago, when the present road was completed.

The opening of the Great Western Turnpike was almost as important an event for the settlement of the country to the west, including the States of New York, Michigan, Indiana and Illinois, as was the building of the Erie Canal or the New York Central, in their day.

Six-horse passenger coaches connected the larger places with the East, and through coaches making the trip from Albany to Buffalo in from three to six days, depending on road and weather conditions. These coaches traveled day and night, with frequent changes of horses. Regular freight lines ran from Albany to the now rapidly growing cities of Syracuse, Rochester and Buffalo. Huge covered wagons, drawn by eight, ten and even twelve horses, were used on these lines. Owing to the value of the wide tires in smoothing down the ruts made by the narrow-tired emigrant and farm wagons, the freight wagons passed free through the numerous toll gates. Drawn by big Pennsylvania horses, which never moved faster than a slow walk, two weeks were commonly consumed in making the trip from Rochester to Albany.

Prosperity Along Its Route.

The enormous traffic, as always along the main routes of travel, brought great growth and prosperity along its entire length. Every few miles hamlets and small villages sprang up, in which blacksmith shops, tanners, hat makers, wagon makers and general stores did a flourishing business, while many small industries in the way of mills were started. The farmers, for whose products the travelers and villages furnished a ready market, prospered proportionately. In fact, from 1800 to 1837 no section of the State enjoyed so great prosperity and activity as that along the route of the Great Western Turnpike.

The opening of the Erie Canal, in 1825, diverted a considerable amount of traffic from the Western Turnpike. The growth of the country to the west and south was so great, however, that the loss was little felt, although most of the through passenger traffic soon went by the packet boats on the canal.

For fifteen years longer a never-ending stream of cattle, sheep and hogs, mingled with the many emigrant, freight and farm wagons and the more rapidly moving stage coaches, flowed over the great turnpike. The big freight wagons running between Albany and Syracuse, Rochester and Buffalo were abandoned soon after the opening of the canal.

Syracuse and Rochester were not on the Great Western Turnpike, but their growth in the early part of the last century caused the building of branch highways to connect them with it. The turnpike, after leaving Albany, ran through the hamlets of Guilderland, Duanesburg, Esperance (crossing the Schoharie Creek on a covered bridge, which still stands, but is to be replaced the coming year by a concrete structure), Sloansville, Carlisle, Sharon Hill, Sharon and Leesville to Cherry Valley, thence through the Springfield settlements, Warren, Richfield (not Richfield Springs), West Winfield, Bridgewater, Sangerfield, Madison, Bouckville, Morrisville, Cazanovia, Pompey to Skaneateles; thence through Auburn, Seneca Falls, Geneva, Canandaigua, Avon and Lancaster, to Buffalo. All of these places were either mere hamlets or small villages during the early years of the Western Turnpike.

The building of the lines of railroads through the Mohawk Valley, which were ultimately consolidated to form the original New York Central, marked the beginning of the end of the through traffic over the Western Turnpike. The great rivers of travel had changed their course and the traffic which once wended its way over the turnpike now hurried over the rails or sailed placidly along on the canal. A good deal of local traffic still passed over the turnpike, and the farmers along its eastern end and from the country south of it continued to drive their weary live stock over it until 1866, when the opening of the Albany & Susquehanna Railroad practically isolated the once great turnpike an it fell into the class of back country roads.

Prior to this date most of the taverns had been turned into farm houses or gradually capitulated to the elements. Villages were rapidly deserted by their young men, and even their elders were being drawn to the Western States, or Eastern cities, which were now offering greater opportunities.

And thue for sixty years lay the once great Western Turnpike, forgotten, neglected and deserted, until three years ago, when the State completed the last link in the trunk line, officially known as Highway Route No. 7 and commonly once more called the Western Turnpike. The congestion caused by the heavy truck traffic and the large villages and cities in the Mohawk Valley at once caused a diversion of the through traffic from that valley to the Western Turnpike. This, and the fact that it is the shortest route west from Albany and runs through a hilly country noted for its scenic beauty, has made it today the leading tourist route across the State.

OLD NEIGHBORLY FLAT LIFE STILL EXISTS IN NEW YORK

But the Janitor of Other Days Has Given Way to The Modern Superintendent

THOSE whose duties take them to the remoter Manhattan districts may glimpse portions of the borough where native New Yorkers live in an old-fashioned New York way. These districts still contain brownstone flat-houses, ruled by janitors with brooms instead of by sleek superintendents and hallboys. Such districts, however, are now rapidly being made over. Tall, imposing apartment houses with tiny kitchenettes and several baths supplant the former roomy "flats."

The days when steam heat and electricity were luxuries to be boasted of to less fortunate neighbors, when hot water was still listed as an attraction on "to let" signboards and the second-floor dwellers were the star renters, are well-nigh days of history. Only a few of these old districts linger in Harlem and on the more unpretentious streets of the middle west side.

They innocently flaunt their ashcans in conspicuous places. Tenants crowd the steps for gossip, as of old. Other audacious souls dare to stretch their heads from windows, resting with arms akimbo on their slate sills.

Clotheslines Vanishing.

In the halcyon days of those first flats the occupants were prosperous trades people and the not so prosperous professional and artist folk. Flat-dwellers lived the placid neighborly life now known only to the suburbanite. In tranquil flower gardens and back yards tenants gathered to read and sew, and along their tree-lined sidewalks they strolled as people do along Riverside Drive. But early in the twentieth century the flat-houses began to abandon their flower gardens and concentrated attention on hot water and steam heat. Buildings came to be designated "old-fashioned" and "up-to-date."

With the up-to-date flat came the janitors and their mops and brooms and pails of soapy water. The janitors and janitresses tended the furnaces and polished the brass step rails. They supplied the morning news to those who did not buy papers. Every tenant they greeted according to his Christmas gift. Every child was a darling when in the vicinity of his mother's skirts; a pest and nuisance when by himself.

Efficient furnace men and polite, neatly dressed superintendents occupy their now relinquished places. Janitorial basements have been for the most part condemned and are but storage rooms for a new class of flat-dwellers. On the old roof tops the good clean wives of the flat-dwellers met Monday mornings to squabble over clotheslines, pulleys, washing powder and the price of butter. Conversation today occasionally touches on exorbitant laundry charges; sometimes there is casual mention of the difficulty of securing able laundresses. No one competes now to exhibit the whitest washing, or takes pride in blankets and woolens.

Such doings, such ambitions, are deemed provincial by the New York of today. Flimsy pink things dried on radiators or on towel-draped chairs are the nearest a modern New Yorker comes to former wash days. Washboards and kitchen soaps are replaced by rinses in dainty white basins. Wash day as an institution is rapidly passing.

TREE PLANTING AIDS CANADA'S PRAIRIE FARMS

A CHANGE in the landscape of the prairies of Western Canada is taking place as the result of tree planting carried on by the Forestry Branch of the Dominion Department of the Interior. Particularly in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta the results are evident, in comparison with the conditions twenty-five years ago. Thousands of shelter belts have been established by means of seedlings, cuttings and transplantings.

The height of the work was reached last Spring when 5,500,000 maple, ash, caranaga, poplar and willow seedlings and cuttings were sent out free to farmers. In addition to the broad-leaf varieties more than 110,000 evergreen, spruce and pine trees were distributed.

The effort began in 1901, when the Canadian Government distributed 58,800 seedlings to forty-seven farmers in Manitoba and the Northwest Territories. Since 1916 the annual distribution has been more than 5,000,000.

The effect of the tree planting on the social and economic life of the prairie Provinces has been marked. Shelter belts have made the homestead more comfortable, and by checking the high winds and conserving moisture they have also increased production.

CANADA'S MOTOR CARS

FARMERS own the largest proportion of automobiles in Western Canada, according to a recent survey by Dominion authorities. Of the total of 241,226 cars in the three Prairie Provinces, the agriculturists own 156,796, or 65 per cent. Total registration in Canada now reaches 719,206, or nearly one car to twelve persons.

USE "SYSTEMS" TO WIN SEATS IN RUSH HOURS

Subway and Elevated Patrons Resort to Strategy in Battle for the Coveted Places

THERE are "systems" for breaking the bank at Monte Carlo, but quite as remarkable are New Yorkers' systems for winning subway seats. At any subway station during the home-going rush, one can pick the system worker. Others may pace the platform or lounge, waiting haphazardly for their trains. The system worker dashes through the gate and makes for a precise spot, where he stands like a sentinel on duty—guarding his pet theory.

Some invariably make for one end of the platform; others believe that chances are better elsewhere. On elevated platforms they depend upon their own knowledge of opening the train gates at the extremities and often they go around the end of the platform where only employes are supposed to be. Not a few crawl through the windows of cars.

Many are convinced that the subway train door will invariably open at the bottom—or it may be at the top—of a flight of steps: there they post themselves, confidently anticipating a seat.

Once inside a train whose seats are already filled the system worker looks about him with practiced eyes. He uncannily senses that restlessness, on the part of a seated patron, that indicates preparation to get off at the next station. In front of this passenger the man with a system takes his stand, ready to drop into the vacancy the moment it is created.

"Want to know a good way to get a seat?" a straphanger was overheard asking his fellow-straphanger one day. "Watch me. As soon as I get on the train downtown I look around for commuters. After a while you get so you can tell them right off if you look close every day. They don't look just like city folks. Usually they've got lots of bundles. Then when you've got so that you know commuters when you see them, always take your place in front of them. When they get off at the Pennsy, you'll get the seat."

Recently a letter came to the Interborough offices from an aggrieved system worker. Long experience had taught him to stand at a certain place on his platform, because the train always opened a door there. Suddenly one day—for no reason so far as he could see—the train came to a stop further along the platform. He had to rush for the door and then stand up all the way. The thing happened again and again, so that he could not count on his seat any more. He wanted to call the attention of officials to the change and to ask that the train stop always in the same spot. In reply he received a letter saying that his complaint had been heard and would be attended to. Ever since then, it is said, the door has been opening at its old accustomed spot.

System workers who adopt such tactics as these are mostly men. Women generally use a different plan. A baby is always guarantee of a seat. Lacking such a burden, women put their faith in weary looks and heavy sighs, hoping that the seated will make way in fear of having feminine straphangers crumple at their feet. Most women who join in the entering scramble have slight chances of success, even with a system. Headwork is often discounted by the brawn of those pushing from behind. But for the benefit of the woman straphanger there is a compensating etiquette. Rarely will a man who has won a seat resign it; but when a seat is vacated by a departing passenger the subway code insists that men straphangers shall not leap into it if there are women standing close at hand.

After Outdoor Exercise Cleanse And Freshen The Skin With Cuticura

Warm baths with the Soap cleanse, cool and refresh the skin. Assisted by the Ointment they help to allay irritation, redness and roughness of the face and hands, and keep the skin soft and clear under all conditions of exposure.

Hair Should Be Well Groomed

Can you always feel sure when removing your hat, of the correct appearance of your hair? Is it well groomed? All unruly hair in its proper place? There is no reason why you should not, when just a few drops of liquid silmerine will keep it just so all day and evening.

For the permanent, marcel or water wave, it is ideal. Holds the wave in place twice as long, besides acting as a tonic, keeping the scalp healthy, free from dandruff and improving the lustrous sheen and fine texture of the hair.

Gentlemen (old and young) now consider liquid silmerine a necessary hair dressing. It can always be depended upon to give a neat, well-groomed effect. At druggists and beauty counters.

EXTRAORDINARY PROGRAM OF SHORE EXCURSIONS INCLUDED IN RATES

25 COUNTRIES 59 PORTS AND CITIES. DURATION 138 DAYS

S.S. RESOLUTE—WORLD CRUISE

Sailing Eastward from New York, January 6, 1927

Take each point of this RESOLUTE World Cruise. Study it carefully and you will find that no cruise has ever been offered American travelers that surpasses it.

The Itinerary
25 Countries—59 Ports and Cities. Each one strange and fascinating—a striking contrast to our own land. Besides the usual Oriental Ports and Cities—Siam, Borneo and Formosa are also visited. The shore excursions included in the fare are extraordinary—their completeness will prove a most pleasant surprise.

The Ship
Travelers who have been on other cruises, and by their experience are qualified to judge the merits of a ship, declare the RESOLUTE the "Queen of Cruising Steamers". Designed for tropical service and with luxurious appointments throughout, she represents the perfection of cruising comfort.

The Personnel
A cruise staff, ship's officers and crew who, because of the experience gained on their former world cruises, are able to anticipate and perform those little niceties of service which contribute so much to the comfort and pleasure of every passenger. The same efficient management aboard ship and ashore.

Rates are $2,000 and up

ROYAL MAIL LEADS THE CRUISING WORLD

26 DE LUXE CRUISES—1926-27

Cruises That Combine New Features and Old Favorites

Fascinating alike to experienced travelers and those planning their first voyage.

AFRICA

Second Great African Cruise, sailing from New York January 15th, for 101 days, by the M. V. "ASTURIAS," visiting South and East Africa—also West Indies, South America, the Sudan, Egypt and Europe—in cooperation with the American Express Company.

MEDITERRANEAN

The New Mediterranean Cruise from New York, February 26th, heads the Company's list of 11 Mediterranean cruises — 10 from England. Seventy days by the splendid cruising steamer "ORCA," featuring the Greek Islands and Dalmatian Riviera—in cooperation with the American Express Company.

WEST INDIES

Three Wonder Cruises from New York: Dec. 21st, Christmas Holiday Cruise of 15 days; Jan. 8th—26 days; Feb. 5th — 17 days; by the magnificent S. S. "ORCA." Also a 42-day cruise by the "ARCADIAN" from England.

NORWAY

Ten summer holiday cruises to the Land of the Midnight Sun, North Cape, the wondrous fjords and Northern Capitals. Sailing from England by the "ARCADIAN" and "ARAGUAYA."

IN pleasure cruising, as well as regular steamship services, The Royal Mail Steam Packet Company holds first place. Chartered in 1839, it is now, with its affiliated companies, the largest shipping organization in the world.

The Royal Mail was first to introduce modern cuisine and comforts on its ships. It now has the world's most luxurious liner, M. V. "ASTURIAS," for its major cruise, to Africa. This will be the first great cruise ever to be made by a motor vessel. The Company also operates the largest vessel devoted solely to pleasure cruising — the "ARCADIAN," "The Cruising Ship Wonderful."

Last season The Royal Mail added South and East Africa to the world of de luxe cruising. This season its Mediterranean cruise from New York will include a number of new places, as interesting as they are unusual.

Regular Services to BERMUDA, EUROPE, SOUTH AMERICA, Etc.

The luxurious "A" steamers "ARAGUAYA" and "AVON" offer cruise-comfort and cruise-delight on regular sailings between New York and Bermuda, "The Gulf Stream Playground." First sailing December 11th; twice-weekly sailings, every Tuesday and Saturday, commencing in January.

Famous Cabin Liners from New York to Europe — Cherbourg and Southampton — are noted for their delightful home-like atmosphere—a wide range of choice accommodations, including economical Tourist Third Cabin. Also services with the invariable Royal Mail standard between Europe and South America.

Illustrated booklets and full information may be obtained from the Company's Offices or from any Steamship Agent

LAND CRUISES to CALIFORNIA

Louisiana "Evangeline Country", the Texas-Mexico Frontier, the Southwestern Indian Lands, Apache Trail, Grand Canyon, New Orleans, Yosemite, Colorado Springs, etc.

First Cruise — December 14
For the winter resident or visitor to California, these cruises transform the ordinary 5-day journey into a vivid vacation trip with constant entertainment and sightseeing without a change of train—and only two or three days longer than on transcontinental trains.

Weekly Service — January 5
Land Cruises will leave the East every Wednesday from January 5 to April 6.

California and Hawaii
You may remain in California "on your own" or allow Raymond-Whitcomb to make your California travel arrangements or book on our California or Hawaii optional trips—and return home later by a different Land Cruise route.

Famous Cruise Trains
Specially constructed for Raymond-Whitcomb—beds instead of berths, private baths, movie, dance and lecture rooms, lounges, gymnasiums—the most luxurious railroad equipment in the world.

Rates for Outward Cruises including return railroad ticket — from New York $375 & up.

Modern Underwear for Modern Activity

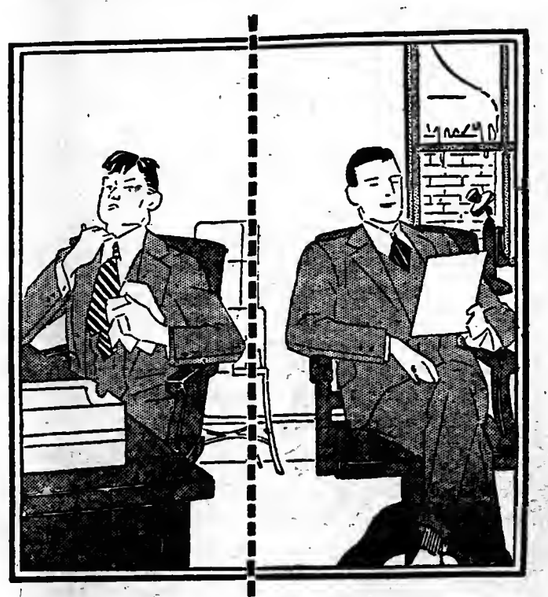
Sit outdoors in the cold—at football game or hockey match Duofold will keep you warm and comfortable—will protect your health.



Duofold helps keep body temperature at an even level. Indoors, where it is warm, you are comfortable.

Out in the cold ~ it's warm

In heated buildings ~ it's comfortable

WE live differently than did our forefathers of a hundred years ago. Better! We wouldn't think of going back to the old ways.

We have modern heating systems—in our homes—in our business places—in our churches and theaters.

And right here we have a new condition which did not exist before the days of modern furnaces and boilers.

For our winters are as cold as ever!

We must dress for both heat and cold. The old-fashioned red flannels that were comfortable in years gone by are impossible today! And yet our health demands that we be warm and comfortable outside!

Science Solves the Problem!

Just as science, knowledge, and skill have provided modern comforts, they have also provided the answer to our modern problems.

Science has given us the underwear that meets every phase of modern life—Duofold Health Underwear!

Made in Two Layers

Duofold Health Underwear is different from all other underwear—it is made in two layers.

Two thin layers, mind you, with air space between. Far better protection than one layer thicker than Duofold's two.

Light—Thin—Yet WARM

Feel this unique two-layer fabric. Find out for yourself how light and thin it is—and then be amazed at the remarkable protection it offers—because it follows the scientific truth that two thin layers, with air space between, offer more protection than one thick layer.

Defies Sudden Changes

Duofold Health Underwear helps maintain body temperature evenly at all times, indoors and out. Step into a warm room right from zero cold outside, and still you are comfortable.

Duofold Prevents Chilling

Leave an overheated building. Go directly into the cold—and despite this sudden change in temperature you won't chill, because Duofold Underwear prevents the cause of chilling.

Perspiration, sometimes so slight it is not apparent, is always present. When you wear Duofold, this perspiration is absorbed by the inner layer first, then absorbed more slowly by the outer layer. It is in the outer layer that evaporation takes place.

Duofold prevents chilling because this evaporation does not occur from the fabric next to the skin. The inner layer next to the skin is always warm.

Comfortable . . . . Every Waking Hour!

Duofold is made in two distinct styles of fabrics, offers you two-fold comfort—the comfort of absolute warmth out-of-doors and the comfort of light weight in heated rooms.

The two-layer fabric insulates. It keeps the cold out. It keeps body warmth in.

Wear Duofold and enjoy glowing, healthful warmth in the coldest, rawest weather.

Wear Duofold and enjoy solid comfort in heated rooms.

For Added Protection—Wool in the Outer Layer—No Itch!

Duofold is made in two distinct styles of fabric, both styles in two layers. In one style, both layers are all cotton. In the other style, wool is in the outer layer. Those who want the added protection of wool can have it in Duofold. And only Duofold offers this added warmth of wool without the itch. For the soft inner layer, next to the skin, is always soft cotton. The wool is there but you feel only its warmth.

Men's Duofold Union Suits $3.00 to $8.00

Despite the unique two-layer feature, despite the perfect quality of material and of tailoring, Duofold Health Underwear is moderately priced.

Men's Union Suits	$3.00 to $8.00
Men's Shirts and Drawers	1.75 to 4.00
Children's and Boys' Union Suits	1.75 to 4.50
Women's Union Suits	3.50 to 5.50
Misses' Union Suits	3.25 to 4.00
Infants' Styles	.35 to 2.00

For Babies and Children— Better Health and More Comfort

Duofold's outer layer contains warm wool. It keeps bodily heat in and cold out—a great health protection.

Duofold's inner layer is of soft cotton—a guard against body irritation and a comfort to tender skin.

Duofold is ideal for babies. It is without equal for children who play out of doors, grow overheated and perspire. For the cotton layer absorbs perspiration, which moisture in turn is attracted to the outer layer where it is evaporated, thus keeping dry both body and the layer next to the skin.

Duofold is modern, scientific, safe and a pleasure to wear. You can buy shirts, bands, binders, etc.

Protect Your Little Ones with Duofold

Get Your Modern, Scientific Underwear From Any of the Dealers Listed Below

Before winter sets in! Go to any of the dealers listed below. You can see how many of them there are in this community—all dealers of the highest type. They know the worth of Duofold. They have stocked their shelves with this underwear designed by science because they know it meets modern needs. Go to any of them and pick out the style that best suits you.

FRANCE LAYS BARE A MAZE OF PLOTS

Arrest of Colonel Garibaldi Turns the Light on the Dark Ways of Italian and Spanish Agents and Revolutionists—Diplomatic Relations Were the Stake in a Great Game of International Spies

THE DISCOVERY OF A PLOT STARTLES ITALY—

AND FRANCE WONDERS WHAT MAY FOLLOW.

By SISLEY HUDDLESTON.

PARIS.

WHO says that the days of high adventure have vanished with the advent of electricity and that deeds of derringdo are impossible in the epoch of airplanes, radio and minutely organized administration? Who says Machiavellian intrigue cannot be practiced with all traditional refinement of treachery and double dealing as in the dim mediaval ages?

Open diplomacy is a noble ideal which certainly is being approached by Governments, but always in secret shadows move men mysteriously plotting and counter-plotting, now working on this side, then on that, criss-crossing, double-crossing, weaving an intricate pattern of deceit which may unexpectedly catch as in a net prominent personalities and even an entire nation.

That France and Italy were not thrown into a formidable collision by the revelations of the methods of the Italian police spies and false anti-Fascist leaders in their pay is due to the promptness of Mussolini in presenting an apology for the indiscretions and violences of Fascist extremists and the willingness of Briand to accept the whole episode as an unfortunate instance of overzealousness of subordinates without permanent diplomatic consequences.

Along with the lurid figures which have emerged from darkness, there emerge also the quixotic figures of Colonel Macia and his followers, who believe that they can climb with alpenstocks across the Pyrenees, raise an army in Catalonia and march on Madrid triumphantly. With Macia, a romantic survivor of heroic years, whose attempt to spring a revolution in Spain was frustrated by the French police, one must sympathize without being suspected of antagonism to King Alfonso or General Primo de Rivera, for courage and faith and desperate endeavor must be admired for themselves independently of the cause to which they happen to be attached. But associated with Macia, the would-be liberator of Spain, is another kind of conspirator, a voluntary exile in France, who is an Italian bearing an illustrious name that doubtless burned like a beacon for Macia and inspired him to emulation.

Macia Copies the Great Garibaldi.

Just as the great Garibaldi more than fifty years ago freed Italy, so Macia meant to free Spain. What more natural than that he should confer with Garibaldi's grandson, Ricciotti Garibaldi, who was understood to be cherishing the same ambition with regard to his own country and planning to sweep away Mussolini, as Macia Primo de Rivera. Exalted patriotism, an ardent desire for liberty, fanatical readiness to risk life and the cause on a single mighty throw, were common to both the Spanish and Italian refugees, for both have persuaded themselves that their respective countries are oppressed by a tyrant whom it is their duty to depose. Both Spaniards and Italians are Latins with romantic ideas which color politics, though usually Italians are vivacious and alert for action while Spaniards, with the possible exception of Catalonians, are more content with dreaming, occasional talking and excited scheming which rarely overcomes their philosophic laziness or translates itself into action.

Colonel Macia, truly fired with a passionate yearning to bring relief, as he supposed, to Spain, came therefore into contact with Ricciotti Garibaldi, a kindred spirit, to outward appearances. These supposed companions in similar conspiracies could hardly have had secrets from each other, Macia doubtless confided at least something of his hopes to Garibaldi. Was this imprudent? The sequel would seem to show Macia mistaken. There were even a handful of Italian volunteers among Macia's feeble forces.

Was Macia Betrayed?

How was Macia detected? Certainly the precautions taken were clumsy and the French police in any case would probably have discovered the designs. But Blasco Ibañez definitely expresses the opinion that Macia is a victim of Garibaldi. On that point it is difficult to pronounce. It is sufficient to say that the French police at the right moment gathered up the pilgrims to the Perpignan (near the Spanish frontier) and saved Spain from a revolutionary uprising. For that they are properly thanked by Spain and instead of Franco-Spanish relations being strained almost to the breaking point by the accusation that the French allowed the plot to be fomented, Franco-Spanish relations are vastly improved by the demonstration of French vigilance in behalf of Spain. This result is gratifying and therefore since nothing tragic has happened one is permitted to spare a passing thought of mingled pity and admiration for the modern impersonation of the foolishly splendid hero of Cervantes.

Here is the romantic side of the story, but now there is a side which must be painted in blacker hues, the side which is shot through with cunning duplicity, treason and machinations which cast a sinister light not only on private individuals but on the responsible authorities and complicate the international situation.

It was about Spain that interest first centred in this extraordinary narrative which elected French soil as its theatre. But interest was quickly transferred to Italy. It would seem that the real events concerned themselves with Spain, yet Spain soon receded into the background. A Spanish insurrection, whether successful or unsuccessful, would be a mere incident, picturesque but unimportant, compared with the immense implications of the sordid but significant story of politico-police plots which were woven between Rome, Nice and Paris. Macia proves to be a puppet in the hands of others playing an amazing game of high diplomacy by low methods. He is precisely the type of honest, sincere zealot who could be used by agents provocateurs who in pretending to strike at Spain were in reality striking at France.

Discoverer of the Plot.

Almost at the same moment that Macia and his followers were intercepted, an exceptionally able Frenchman whose name rarely appears in the papers made a masterstroke. M. Chiappe has a nominal position corresponding to a sort of secretary to the Minister of the Interior. But in truth he is a super-policeman who holds all the threads of every intrigue in France and perhaps beyond the French borders. He sits, a quiet, clean shaven man, in a little office in Paris, but to and from that little office flash a million messages. There is not a foreigner in France of any prominence or importance whose activities are not known to M. Chiappe and his assistants. He recalls those great police chiefs who have found a conspicuous place in French history. His work is much more delicate than that of a detective engaged in the greatest affairs. He is also a diplomatist and must know the moment when to act and when not to act. Sometimes tolerance may be necessary rather than a course which would, from the national viewpoint, be mischievous. Sometimes it is better to allow matters to ripen instead of nipping them in the bud.

What a tangled web is that which he carefully watches—the web of Bulgarian, Russian Rumanian, Italian and Spanish plotters who, dissatisfied with conditions in their own countries, come to Paris or the Riviera to mingle with their compatriots in these essentially cosmopolitan centres. The threads must be kept distinct, though sometimes as in the present instance they tend to become confused. Before this retiring French official gives orders he must be sure not only of his facts but of the opportuneness of exposing them. His judgment must be flawless. He must not be precipitate and miss, he must not be hesitant and fail.

Foreign Agitators Warned.

In the Garibaldi affair the diplomatist detective timed everything with perfect precision. A few weeks ago the way was prepared by a warning issued from the Ministry of Interior that France would take a grave view of foreign agitation on her soil. Doubtless the warning was scarcely regarded seriously but it is now seen that it had a timely purpose. Exactly as the Macia campaign was scattered, Chiappe caused Garibaldi to be apprehended.

It was a startling move, barely understood in all its bearings for some days. Now it is clear that it isn't so much the exposure of Garibaldi's strange proceedings which is the object of the political police as the exposure of the Italian Government that has, it is alleged, been subterraneously hostile to France. Italians have not, indeed, disguised their anti-French sentiments, but in addition to overt actions there have been less avowable and more covert actions, whether directed by subordinates or highest authorities remains to be seen.

The discrediting of Garibaldi has, by implication been a blow to Italian diplomacy. The radical journalist and Deputy, Lautier, in praising Chiappe, says jubilantly that he is the man who has beaten Mussolini. It may be this is an exaggeration. It may be Mussolini is entirely innocent of the charges brought against him in France. It may be that Mussolini is badly served by irresponsible persons. But however this may be, the consequences of the scandal undoubtedly fall to some extent on Mussolini and weaken the Fascist system in the eyes of the world.

Let us examine the two main allegations against Fascism in its international dealings in so far as they affect the case of Garibaldi. The first charge we have already touched upon in suggesting that Italian connivance in the Catalonian rising was calculated to produce friction between France and Spain. Italy, with her Mediterranean ambitions, has need of Spanish friendship and support. France is considered to be opposed to the Italian projects. Clearly, therefore, a Franco-Spanish rapprochement could not be regarded with equanimity by Italy. Anything which tended to separate Spain and France would be advantageous from the Italian viewpoint and would enable Italy to effect her transactions with Spain.

How far Macia was pushed into his ill-fated adventure cannot be ascertained, but in well-informed circles it is freely stated that certain Italian personages, perhaps using Garibaldi as a medium, were interested in demonstrating to the Spanish Government that the French police did not fulfill its duty. This sounds too far-fetched to be entirely true, and it must be confessed that such complicity is not established. Whether accurate or inaccurate, however, such is one aspect of the episodes which reveal in a blaze of light the possibilities of Machiavellian machinations. It is almost incredible and, were there no other aspect of this triangular duel, if a paradoxical expression be admitted, it would be better to dismiss the theory as fantastic and unsubstantial. Strategy of this kind is more likely to turn against the oversubtle strategists than yield anticipated results. There was always an overwhelming chance that the cabal would be shattered and, therefore, Spain would be grateful to France and resentful of Italian interference, assuming that suspicions of Italy were justified.

It seems then that stress should not be laid on this particular count of the indictment. But there is another phase of the dramatic events which does, indeed, seem to bear out the French supposition that Fascists of higher or lower rank were engaged in digging a mine to explode under French diplomacy, and it is here that we reach the heart of the story, which could hardly be paralleled in modern annals. As a preliminary, however, it is necessary to say something about Garibaldi and the circumstances in which he was detained and questioned.

The Central Figure of the Plot.

Garibaldi, a descendant of the greatest hero of Italian liberation, fought with his brothers, against whose loyalty no whisper is heard, on the side of the French during the war. Afterward he took up an antagonistic attitude toward Fascism and was accepted in France as one of the chiefs of the anti-Fascist movement. He was trusted by those exiles who bewailed the régime to which their country was subjected and longed for the return of more normal days. Obviously, were he a traitor he would have had many opportunities of indicating to the Fascist police the whereabouts of his anti-Fascist colleagues and giving information respecting their designs. No deadlier charge could be brought against any man than that of deceiving his compatriots and perhaps of delivering them over to the authorities with which they are in a state of war.

It would be imprudent to pronounce against Garibaldi finally, but evidence has accumulated in a most troubling manner against him. It would seem that he fell into disfavor among the anti-Fascists because they were disappointed with his activities and noted that he spent money somewhat too freely. Nevertheless a number of anti-Fascists still believed in him. He arranged to send Scivoli, a man in humble position devoted to him, on a mission into Italy. Scivoli consented to carry messages, but pointed out that his passport was not in order. At the request of Garibaldi he came from Paris to Nice, where Garibaldi promised to have his passport adjusted.

Now the French police were already extremely curious about the movements of an Italian police chief named Lapolla. It is proved that Lapolla entered France under an assumed name on more than one occasion. Investigations which he conducted without official cooperation of the French police were unquestionably improper, for although it is admitted that a foreign police officer may work with the police of another nation, he must not, according to international custom, do so behind the backs of the national police. Eventually he was requested to leave French territory, where his presence in such circumstances constituted a scandal.

Maze of Double-Crossing.

During his sojourn in France he saw Garibaldi on several occasions. It is even shown beyond doubt that he gave considerable sums of money to Garibaldi. Moreover, in his baggage was found the passport of Scivoli together with photographs of him. How had they come there? The theory which is formulated is that it was arranged that Scivoli be sent to Italy, be stopped on the frontier by means of widely distributed photographs, compromising letters be seized upon him and he and others implicated in a project against the Italian régime. It is fortunate for Scivoli that he never crossed the frontier.

Garibaldi strenuously denies that he participated in a bogus plot against Mussolini. He professes that always he was serving the anti-Fascist cause. His relations with Lapolla are acknowledged, but there is a suggestion, which cannot be dismissed lightly, that if he was guilty of double-dealing it was the Fascists and not the anti-Fascists he meant to dish. While taking Fascist money, it is possible he intended to employ it for anti-Fascist purposes. One may even have doubts about the precise rôle of Lapolla. Anything is possible in this extraordinarily complicated labyrinth of double, triple, perhaps quadruple, crossing, and it is better to suspend judgment about the precise destination of paths in this mighty maze.

But whatever was the exact objective, it is indisputable that Fascists and anti-Fascists were in communication, that Garibaldi nearly supplied the Italian police with evidence of a faked conspiracy at least once, and, as it would seem, perhaps twice. Immediately the revelations were made Federzoni, Italian Minister of the Interior, resigned. It would appear he was involved. Although given another post and the Ministry of Interior taken by Mussolini himself, he can scarcely be acquitted of some knowledge of these underhand proceedings, which have threatened to jeopardize Franco-Italian relations and may well supply the Italian Government with a pretext for sterner measures against those who do not fully accept the existing régime. So we arrive at a hypothesis which would give an unpleasant diplomatic meaning to this tangled story.

Franco-Italian difficulties have been growing. The Locarno pact has removed the danger from the Rhine. But clouds begin to gather over the Alps. They can easily be dissipated, but it is essential that they should be dissipated before they grow greater. The French dislike the Italian régime. They have encouraged a Republican Constitution in Germany, and they think the Italian dictatorship undemocratic.

Strained Franco-Italian Relations.

The Italian press has complained of the attitude of the French press, but the French press, with rare exceptions, endeavors not to indulge in recriminations. For some reason, altogether inadequate, Fascism has grown angry with France. Italy believes herself aggrieved. At the Peace Conference she was weak and did not obtain all she desired. Particularly was she disappointed in respect to Colonial mandates. This was not especially the fault of France, yet it is France which is blamed. Now, Italy believes herself strong and looks for compensation in Abyssinia, Tangier, Tunisia and Syria. Wherever she turns she finds France already in possession. History shows that dictatorships need to be bolstered up by extraterritorial aggrandizement. Whenever an attempt is made to assassinate Mussolini it is customary to endeavor to fix responsibility on France.

Sometimes Fascist manifestations against France have been most excessive in character. There was notably the attack on French railroad employes in a frontier station town. There was the invasion of the French Consulate in Tripoli. An altogether deplorable agitation has been worked up and newspapers of Italy, which, after all, are largely controlled by authorities, do not hesitate to accuse France of harboring anti-Fascists and permitting them to form complots on French soil.

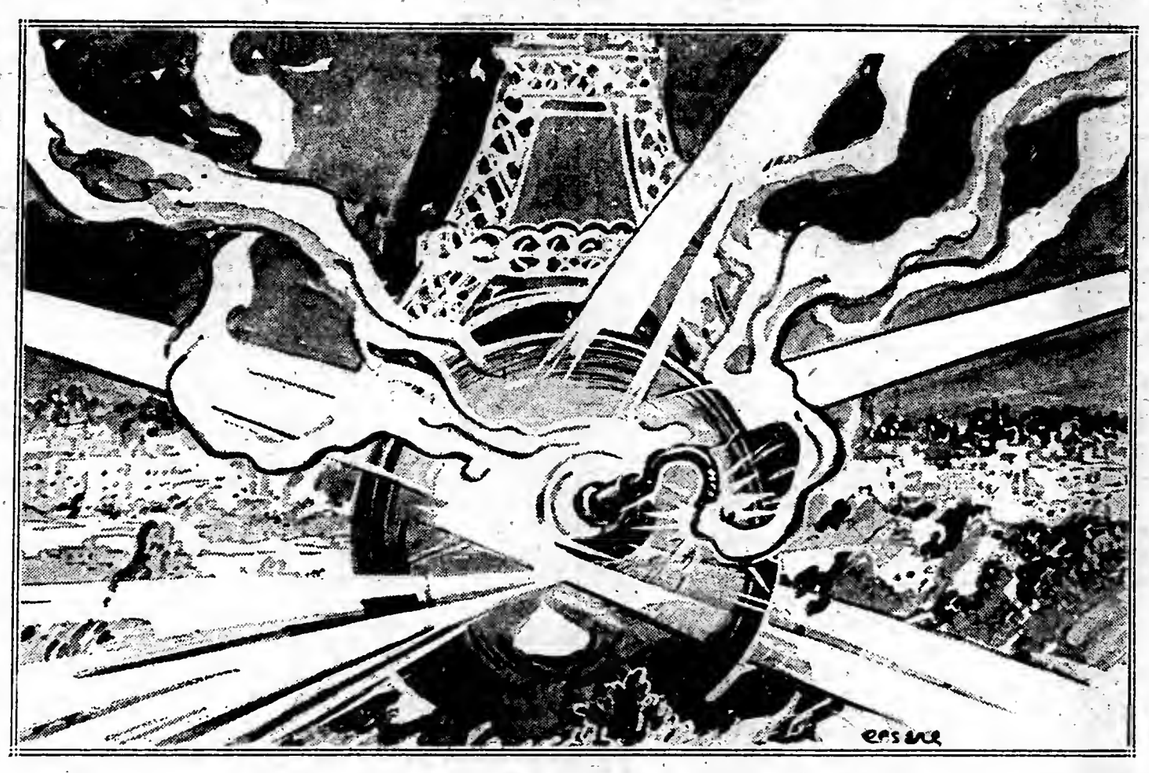
What is the diplomatic gain that can be expected from these accusations? Apparently there is some idea, conscious or unconscious, of forcing the hand of France and obtaining concessions for the sake of peaceful relations. Were this hypothesis well founded it would be a perilous procedure. Were it certain that an attempt was made to manufacture evidence it would be a diplomatic incident far transcending the story of Garibaldi's personal loyalties or treacheries. There is probably considerable exaggeration on both sides, and what we have witnessed was rather a battle of political police which happens to lend itself dramatically to diplomatic interpretation. It would be wise while bearing these facts in mind to refrain from overcoloring them, and assuming that either the Italian Government or the French Government is directly responsible for what may be merely disgraceful contrivances of spies, counter spies, adventurers and secret police. Still, though a moderate view be taken of the circumstances, it is more than ever incumbent on Mussolini and Briand to meet and effect an understanding.

These are the bare facts:

Colonel Ricciotti Garibaldi was arrested at his villa at Nice on Nov. 4. There followed the unraveling of an astounding series of plots and counterplots. The arrest came close upon the frustration of the march of a band of revolutionists organized by Colonel Francisco Macia, who were attempting to cross the border and raise a revolution in Catalonia. Macia surrendered to the French police. Then came the charges linking the Italian plots around Garibaldi and the Spanish plot.

Colonel Garibaldi was taken to Paris, where he has been daily questioned by the head of the secret police, and the evidence of the dealings of the Italian exiles and Italian secret police in France has been given out. The revelations of the French police were followed by the resignation of the Italian Minister of Interior, Signor Federzoni. The Mussolini Government sent a formal apology to the French Government for anti-French "incidents."

Behind these simple facts is an amazing drama which is revealed in the accompanying article.



GERMANS STUDYING SOUTH ATLANTIC

A GROUP of German scientists, the Ministries of the Reich and the Federal Governments, as well as a number of German scientific bodies, some time ago united for the purpose of outfitting an expedition to explore a part of the South Atlantic. The German naval authorities assigned to the expedition a vessel called the Meteor. Funds were provided by the Relief Organization of German Science, and Professor Merz, the Director of the Institute and Museum for Ocean Research, which is connected with the University of Berlin, undertook the rest of the work in connection with planning and equipment.

The expedition itself is confined to a definite object—the exploration of a region of the Atlantic lying between the 20th degree north and the 55th degree south latitude. The South Atlantic is to be traversed fourteen times. The vessel comes to a stop twenty or thirty times in midsea, at points from 100 to 200 miles apart, and at each of these halting places measurements are carried out—from the surface down to the ocean bottom. Some 350 such places had been foreseen, and these were to be comprised in a voyage of some 80,000 miles.

The expedition has now accomplished more than half of its task and the first reports have come to Berlin. They deal with many new and remarkable details and discoveries, some of them of great service to science. Not only has the temperature and the salt content of the water been measured at various depths, but the water also has been chemically analyzed to determine its ingredients—partly in the laboratory aboard the ship, partly by chemists in Berlin. When the task is completed the scientists of the expedition will have some 6,000 to 7,000 samples of the water of the South Atlantic, each from a precise spot. These will assist them in ascertaining the circulation of the currents in this ocean.

Modern science, in particular that represented by a group of Norwegian scholars, is of the opinion that the water envelope and the air envelope of our planet stand in a close and dynamic relation to each other and that each reacts upon the other. It was therefore necessary to investigate the air as well as the water. Kites and pilot and registering balloons were prepared, and by this means it was possible to measure the temperature, the humidity, the direction and velocity of the wind in very high regions.

Geologists on board the Meteor examined soil brought up from the depths, while biologists observed the vegetable and animal life.

The long cruise was begun April 16, 1925, when the Meteor departed from Wilhelmshaven, taking her course to Buenos Aires by way of the Cape Verde Islands.

Busy Whaling Season.

At Cape Horn the first iceberg was sighted in 60 degrees south latitude. Other bergs soon followed. Most of these showed bizarre signs of erosion—grottoes, pillars, arches, hollows beautifully chiseled out by the waves. Some of the bergs were more than 300 feet high and a mile in extent. The approach to every iceberg was registered by means of a special water thermometer.

A sudden increase in the number of whales was observed in the vicinity of the South Shetland Isles. During the Summer the Meteor lay at anchor in the harbor of Deception Island. This harbor is formed by the circular walls of a sunken crater. Here, during the height of the antarctic whaling season, some 1,500 men are busy boiling the blubber. Hot steam emerges from rifts in the ground, the rocks being of lava-like formation. Occasional earthquakes are felt.

The wireless news service of the big station at Nauen, near Berlin, could be plainly heard during the entire cruise, even at 63 degrees south latitude. In ascertaining the various depths of the ocean a new acoustic method was made use of. This consists in estimating the time taken for the echo of a report to come back from the sea bottom. As these echo soundings can be carried out while the vessel is under headway, they may be used far more frequently than was the case with the old manner of sounding with a cable, which necessitated the lowering and raising of a plummet, often entailing hours of work.

More than 20,000 depths have been established by these soundings; the fact is revealed that the bottom formations of the Atlantic Ocean are coordinated to a far greater degree than science had hitherto thought. This is especially true of the so-called ridge of the bottom formations—that is, the spine of the submarine mountain range running longitudinally through the North and South Atlantic.

OUR TOWN AND ITS FOLK

Five Blocks West

By BERTRAM REINITZ.

BROADWAY and the Forties do not comprise the only section of mid-Manhattan where roving lights mock the night. From dusk until dawn, over on Eleventh Avenue, between West Thirtieth and West Thirty-fourth Streets, piercing incandescent shafts frustrate the darkness of a dingy district. These beams are projected headlights of a dozen locomotives, giant moguls that nndge and shunt freight cars in a yard where red and green switch lamps warn and beckon.

The yard extends westward to Twelfth Avenne. It is irregularly scarred by scores of straight and curling tracks, alchemized by the headlights into bars of bright gold. Twenty trails cross Eleventh Avenue and drop slowly to Eighth, where the big underground freight depot is situated. The yellow lanterns of the signalmen wave motorists back; and the halted automobiles are fragile toys compared with the mounds of metal that hiss and toil as they pass. Occasionally an open firebox reveals a man's silhonette figure. On the car tops brakemen negotiate their perilous path as unconcernedly as if they were on the Boardwalk of Atlantic City.

It is difficult to conceive that all this is within five blocks of Broadway. Flagman Dan Murtha has been on duty here for nearly a quarter of a century, yet he knows little abont the white light district.

"About once a year or so," said Dan, "me and ths missus get eporty of an evening that I have off and we go to one of those big movie places. We get bumped around by the million people who are trying to walk in a space meant for a couple of thousand and when we want to cross the street a flock of those crazy taxicahs try to attack us.

"You can bet your sweet life I can't wait until I get back to the yard among all those friendly freight trains. The only night life I want le over on Eleventh Avenue. Groggins' Freighthandlers' Rest le my favorite night clnh."

The Happy Triangle

JUST north of the point where the upper roadway of Manhattan Bridge slips on to Manhattan itself is situated the smallest and busiest athletic field in the city. The fact that the spot has never been officially designated by the municipal authorities as a reservation for recreation does not detract from the important rôle it plays in the neighborhood.

This space is triangular, bounded by the bridge approach and Forsythe and Canal Streets. Occupants of the bumper-to-bumper procession of machines that files over the upper roadway into Manhattan in the morning and toward Brooklyn in the evening are accorded a fleeting glimpse of the athletes in action.

There is keen competition for the use of the field. When school is out in the afternoone youngsters make a frantic dash for preferred positions. Books strewn on the sidelines attest to a direct route from the school, without even a stop-over at home for bread and hutter. Latecomers act reluctantly as spectators and console themselves by making resounding and highly unfavorable comments npon the technique of the participants.

The limited area of the field necessitates some unusual ground rules. A baseball that alights in a peddler's pushcart parked on Forsythe Street entitles the batter to a maximum of two bases. A hit that invades a limousine on the bridge is a home run—or rather a run home—for just about everybody on the lot.

Seagoing Jobs

LIGHT of the eleven agencies in the metropolis that provide ships for seamen and crewe for ehips are huddled on the south side of Coenties Slip, the historic street that runs from Front Street to South, a distance of one block. As early as 6 o'clock in the morning and as late as 8 in the evening, grizzled men who work on the ocean collect in quest of sea-going jobs. There are ancient mariners and young ones; there are flaxen-haired Scandinavians and swarthy-skinned South Americans; there are cooks, cahin boys and would-be crews of the captain's gig. Many of them carry all that they own in a bundle.

There le a fairly brisk demand for cabin boys at thie time and some slight call for deckhands. The blackboards at the entrance of the agencies say little about stewards, oilers and stokers. In fact, the market for men of the sea is rather quiet—so quiet that several of the recruiting depots are prominently featuring a demand for laborers on State roads, with such inducements as swimming, fishing, good board and nine hours a day at 50 cents an hour. These offers, one employment agent said, are making landlubbers out of a number of very ahle seamen.

While this agent is occasionally visited by disgusted invoice or shipping clerks who want to sail away from what they regard as irksome environment, there has been a marked falling off in the total of city-hred candidates for seafaring positions.

"We don't get nearly as many young New Yorkers in here as we did twenty years ago," he says. "I honestly think one reason for this is that parents aren't as strict now as they used to be. I can remember when quite a bunch of boys would breeze in here and ask me to book them for the longest possible cruise because the old man had taken a healthy sock at them because they stayed out an hour or two later at night than he thought they should."

Rechristened

NO dust clouds raised by twinkling hoofs of proud pacers and trotters hover ahove the Harlem River Speedway on these crisp afternoons as they did in the not so long ago. The old Speedway, paved with asphalt, has heen rechristened the Driveway and has been selected as one of the three thoroughfaree in the metropolis where the motorist may make twenty-five milee an hour and still he within the legal limit.

The Driveway covers a somewhat sheltered stretch from 155th Street to Dyckman, into which it mergee at the foot of Fort George Terrace. Rugged Highbridge Park risee from the west border of the Driveway and back of the park is banked Washington Heights. The Harlem River ekirts the east edge of the drive. The uptown waterway is in turn rimmed by University and Morris Heights, thus forming a valley in which the Driveway and the river rest. The former is separated from the latter in many places hy coal and freight yarde and by loud localities where stone is crunched into concrete. But there are a numher of points where to drop from the cement rail of the Driveway would mean a plunge into muddy flats or into the river itself.

The smooth, wide street is generously populated on pleasant afternoons hy groups of youngsters seeking adventure. The eloping sides of Highbridge Park are rich in ideal lairs for stop-at-nothing brigands, who, nevertheless, must deeert their fastnessee to be home in time for dinner. This means that many venturesome youths must leave quite early, because they come from as far south ae Yorkville and as far north as Riverdale.

For hoys who love the sea, the Harlem River is particularly inviting. Scores of them eit upon the Driveway wall and play that some brick scow lying just below is a gallant craft that is going to carry them off to the Indies, where, according to reliable reports, there are no schools or teachers.

A Police Matter.

Strong measures will be taken in Italy against parents who name their children after prominent Anti-Fascists.

Rococo J. Epalstro was perhaps the gladdest man
That ever sold spaghetti in the markets of Milan—
And may not any man with joy be very nearly wild
Whose Missus has presented him just lately with a child?
But lo! here came the fierce police in shirts as black as night
And haled R. J. Epalstro to the local Magistrite.

"The charge," his Honor thundered, "is that you have failed to name
Your offspring for our Premier, which the law requires the eame.
Such treasonable conduct smacks"—the Judge here made a pause—
"Of grose antagonism to the glorious Fascist cause.
You scorn (and I must mention that it strikes me as a plot)
To call your child Benito. You are guilty, are you not?"

"Alas!" Rococo J. replied, and trembled like a leaf,
"While I am quite devoted to our estimable Chief
And while I vote his ticket with considerable vim,
I couldn't, oh! I couldn't name the baby after him!
You see"—around Rococo's lips the smiles began to curl—
"You eee, your Honor, if you please, our kiddy is a girl."

STRANGER THAN FICTION

A Refugee's Legacy

By S. T. WILLIAMSON.

IN the ehadows of roller coasters once alive with plunging, climbing carloads of ehrieking 'Arries and 'Arriets was hilieted a miserable company of people. There were children of all sizes, women of all agee, old people of varying dispositions, but no yonng men who were not armless or legless or sightless or otherwise ohviously incapacitated.

A worn sign outside one large building carried a few words in laviah praise of the smoothness of the floor and the excellence of the band within. It was false, for inside no cockney clerks and their lyedy friends bobbed, glided, ewayed and bumped into each other. The interior was filled with hospital cots, and every bed was occupied. Eating places, where stolid shopkeepers and their melancholy wives used to vary their interminable home diet of mntton with fancier cooking, were now soup kitchens.

Whole families, even the greater proportion of the population of small villages, were stowed away in cubicles that once were sideshows. Hung outside some of the huildings were still some of the lurid canvases of former years, advertising the Knrdish sword swallower from Sheffield, the African giant who was born in Jamaica, the living skeleton from Leeds and Oriental dancers from Houndsditch. Only the sign exaggerating the interest of the incubator babies was not out of place, for behind it were more incubators and more babies than ever.

The eky above Earls Court at night no longer was brilliant with flaming chrysanthemume of bursting rockets and other fireworks. Instead, great fingers of light from innumerahle searchlights wagged admonition at the clouds and any Zeppelins that might be hiding in them. London's great amusement park was now a clearing station for Belgian refugees, over whose lands men in field gray and many one-time habitues of Earls Court were making targets of each other, good and bad reputations for their Gensrals and casualty lists for the newspapers.

THE baby hospital was visited one day by a childless couple. The man was unusually prosperous, for he was a distiller of a famous brand of Scotch whisky.

The distiller and his wife opened their hearts to an orphan baby girl. According to the records she was the daughter of a Belgian artisan. Adoption papers were signed, and Marie Susette, born in a cottage, became one of a household where gathered frequently many of Britain's war leaders. The distiller was active in public life, and throughout the war he held a number of important Government posts.

Thus, a Belgian baby became close friends with members of the British Government than were even the King and Queen of her little native country. A frequent visitor at the distiller's house and a particular favorite of the refugee foster daughter was an elderly, stocky little man with almost a shock of grayish hair, an unusually pugnacious chin, tachs and darting, quizzical eyes.

The little man was an adroit talker, an agile opponent in an argument, and had an unusual knack of landing figuratively on his feet after any upheaval of his plans. He was a man in whom rested great power, and all in the distiller's household, with the exception of Marie Susette, paid him great deference. She would sit on the little man's knee while he discussed plans for the production of shells and more explosives with them to blast invaders out of Marie Susette's country.

FOR services to his Government the distiller was made a baron. Next a blazing decoration was pinned on his lapel, and he was entitled to put after his name a hundred of letters of the alphabet. Finally he was created first Baron of Holmbury, which meant a seat in the House of Lords.

The distiller's wife died while his titles were multiplying, and one of her last requests was that the refugee foster daughter would be provided for. The first Baron of Holmbury married again, a widow with a daughter, who also was legally adopted.

Finally the distiller died. After Boards of Directors and municipalities and clubs spread upon their records heavily worded resolutions of regret, his will was opened. The dying request of his first wife was fulfilled. A refugee girl spirited out of Belgium and through Earls Court became an heiress.

Under the will of Lord Stevenson of Holmbury, made public last week, his foster daughter, Marie Susette, has a share in his $1,500,000 estate.

TAX REDUCTION BECOMES AN ISSUE ONCE MORE

President's Proposal for Rebate Stirs Debate—Democrats Fight for Revision of Present Schedules

SENATOR REED SMOOT, REPUBLICAN:

*"In the long run it probably will save taxpayers more for this surplus to be used in retiring the public debt * * * I don't think it can be contended that either income tax rates or tariff duties at the present time are on the whole uneconomic."*

SENATOR FURNIFOLD M. SIMMONS, DEMOCRAT:

"I am confident that both in the House and Senate there will be a sufficient number of votes to pass a tax reduction bill that will do full justice to American taxpayers and not merely provide relief for a part of the taxpayers, and in the main those who have not in fact paid the tax."

By A. H. ULM.

TAXES again loom as the outstanding subject of controversy in the realm of national affairs, although not much more than six months have elapsed since Congress revised the major group of Federal taxing schedules. None of the preceding controversies was beset by so many varying points of view as the present one. Of these last there are virtually five:

President Coolidge's.

The Treasury Department's.

That of Republican leaders in Congress.

That of Democratic leaders.

One held by miscellaneous groups.

No one of them, except possibly the President's, has been fully defined, but between all of them there are sharp points of difference. The most subtle factor in the undercurrents of the controversy is the approaching Presidential campaign of 1928, of which the present tax discussion is the virtual beginning. And in the background is the old question of the tariff, the more recent question of the war debts, domestic and foreign, and that of governmental retrenchment.

Surplus Taxes Since the War.

The concrete point of the tax discussion is in the continuing accumulation of surpluses in the Federal Treasury. This has been going on regularly since the war, to which it is primarily due, for the new conditions brought about by the war and the tremendous expansion in governmental financing rendered obsolete all of the pre-war gauges. The surplus at the close of the last fiscal year totaled $377,767,816, despite three tax-revising attempts to bring revenues down to a parity with scheduled needs. The surpluses, which have been applied to the reduction of the public debt, have totaled nearly $2,000,000,000 since the war.

On June 30 next there will be another surplus of perhaps $250,000,000 in the Federal Treasury. That fact is agreed upon by virtually all participants in the present controversy. Its prospective existence is due in part to better business conditions than were anticipated by the framers of the present tax act.

President Coolidge began the tax debate by proposing, shortly after the election, that the bulk of this year's surplus be disposed of in advance by declaring a sort of "dividend" on this year's payments of income taxes by both individuals and corporations.

The President's proposal, as originally outlined at the White House, seemed to envisage the sending of refund checks, before Christmas, to this year's income taxpayers for 10 to 12 per cent. of 1926 payments. The Treasury finds that such would not be practicable, and suggests that if the surplus be returned, next year's taxpayers be permitted to make compensatory deductions from their first and second instalments. While rating the President's proposal as a feasible one, the Treasury shows little enthusiasm for thus disposing of a surplus which authorities there say will be in no sense troublesome to the Government.

Corporations Would Get Most.

A 10 per cent. rebate would mean the return of about $175,000,000 to around 4,000,000 taxpayers. More than one-half of it would go to corporations, from which have been coming the most active demand for further revision of income tax rates.

President Coolidge indicates that he does not favor going further than declaring a "dividend," so to speak, on income tax payments for a single year. He favors the leaving of all revision of rates to the future. Since the last tax act was passed the Treasury Department has been outspoken in opposition to further meddling with the tax laws in the near future.

Republican leaders of conservative type in Congress seem to agree with the Treasury. Noteworthy among these is Senator Reed Smoot, of Utah, who is Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee. He does not take heartily to the President's proposal that the prospective surplus be returned to taxpayers.

"In the long run, it probably will save taxpayers more for this surplus to be used in retiring the public debt," he said. "The Treasury must take up about $2,500,000,000 worth of war bonds within eighteen months. Some of these have been purchased by it in the open market. The more of them that can be canceled the better the terms on which refunding bonds can be sold, thus cutting the continuing interest charge. A refund to income taxpayers involves an element of unfairness, for persons who paid tobacco taxes or taxes on theatre tickets or various other things on which Federal exactions still are made contributed also to the surplus."

Senator Smoot is also opposed to anything like a revision at the present time of the internal or import tax rates.

"The surplus in prospect for this fiscal year may be an illusory one," he said. "It does not prove that the present tax act, which has been in effect less than a year, will yield more than was expected of it. Much of the total collections for this year are back taxes levied under former acts that imposed much higher rates. Half of the ordinary collections for the last fiscal year were under the act of 1924. Moreover, the country has been enjoying unusually good business conditions which have made for possibly abnormal yields of internal and import taxes. It is better to collect more than we plan to than to run the risk of having to raise rates or impose new taxes in case of industrial depression.

"Of course, the Government should not raise more in taxes than is needed for the economical conduct of its affairs. But, aside from revenues, I don't think it can be contended that either income-tax rates or tariff duties at the present time are on the whole uneconomic. The tariff duties will yield for this fiscal year around $600,000,000, or about twice as much as ever were yielded by so-called low duties, and six-tenths of our imports are coming in free of duty. While I don't believe there is any occasion for considering a general revision of the tariff, we who favor protection are ready for a fight there if it must come."

The Utah Senator indicated that the next revising of income taxes probably will take seriously into account the corporation item, which has been virtually unchanged since the war.

President Coolidge is anxious to avoid a party division on the proposed tax rebate and through the White House "spokesman" has appealed for harmony. He would like to have the proposal looked at as a "business proposition."

Opposition of the Democrats.

Democratic leaders, however, are not in the "harmonizing" frame of mind which marked their course when the present tax act was going through Congress early in the year. More nearly than any enacted since the war, that one was a non-partisan product. It did not go quite so far in some directions as Democratic leaders advocated and fell short in some particulars of what the Administration desired. But it achieved a reduction of something like $350,000,000 in taxes, the benefits being widely scattered.

Democrats now contend that it could have gone to the full extent which they urged without danger to the Government's fiscal affairs. With their situation improved in both the House and Senate, Democratic leaders indicate that they are ready to go on the warpath as to taxes. Apparently, they will oppose President Coolidge's rebate proposal, on the ground that it is inadequate and unfair.

In voicing his disapproval, Senator F. M. Simmons of North Carolina, who is ranking minority member of the Senate Finance Committee, contends that the prospective surplus from this year's taxes should not only be returned but the one from last year's taxes should likewise be restored to the taxpayers. But he opposes the President's plan of rebating, on the ground that it would benefit only a preferred class of taxpayers. This, he says, is particularly true of refunds to corporations, which merely treat income tax as an item in the cost of operations and add it to the prices charged for products.

"A rebate, or refund, merely returns the money to the agency which collected it and paid it into the Treasury," said Senator Simmons. "For instance, in the case of an automobile tax, a refund returns the tax to the manufacturer — although everybody knows the manufacturer did not pay a cent of it."

What the Senator proposes is another reduction in Federal taxes. He has not indicated the particular ones he would reduce or repeal.

"I am confident," he said, "that in both the House and Senate there will be a sufficient number of votes to pass a Tax Reduction bill that will do full justice to American taxpayers and not merely provide relief for a part of the taxpayers and, in the main, those who have not in fact paid the tax. I am confident that Congress will present the President a bill which will so nearly meet the unanimous will of the taxpayers of the country that he will find it exceedingly difficult to veto it, even though it may, to some extent, interfere with certain plans for the campaign in 1928."

Treasury for Caution.

Although not opposing the President's proposal, Treasury experts hold that Federal taxes and finance are now on such a wholesome basis that changes should be considered very seriously before made. They point to the success of income tax levies on the basis of lowered surtaxes, holding that it affords incontrovertible proof of the contention made constantly by them that high rates do not necessarily yield the biggest returns. The yields from big incomes have increased with every cutting of the surtaxes since 1921.

"But the rates are now close to the level which is most productive of revenue," the Treasury experts say. "The only reason for cutting them further is to reduce the revenues. And a surplus of $250,000,000 in times like we have had during the last year is of itself no justification for cutting the revenues. This surplus can be quite advantageously used in making further retirements of the public debt so as to lay the foundation for secure reduction in taxes."

"The surplus of last year and the expected one for this fiscal year," said Joseph S. McCoy, Treasury actuary, "can be accounted for and more by collections outside of the tax acts prevailing at the time. During the last fiscal year the Treasury collected more than $400,000,000 in back taxes that were due mostly because of conditions that have virtually ceased to be. When the war taxes were first imposed a lot of people did not know how to make out their returns, with the result that the Treasury has been collecting from them ever since. This source of revenue is drying up; it probably will not yield more than $50,000,000 a year after this fiscal year. Most of the salvage from the war has been liquidated also."

One group, not so vocal as the others, is inclined to pursue a point of view as to the present tax question that differs with those of the President, the Treasury Department and Senators Smoot and Simmons. This group would dispose of the prospective surplus by spending it, in the form of new or increased appropriations, particularly for public improvements. But the Administration has no thought of relenting in its pursuit of a program of rigid economy, and proposed new or increased appropriations are to face a difficult road, at least in the coming special session of Congress.

Government Costs to Rise.

The post-war low mark of Federal Government spending seems to have been reached and past, despite continued pressure for economy.

"After every war there is a sharp decline in Government expenditures as the country gets back to a peace basis," said Garrard B. Winston, Under Secretary of the Treasury, in a recent speech. "As opposed to this there are increases through the growth of the country and the after costs of war, principally pensions. In a few years the curve of decreasing abnormal expenditures is met by the curve of increasing normal expenditures. * * * Total expenditures chargeable against ordinary receipts by the Federal Government in 1920, the first real year of peace, of $6,500,000,000 dropped to $3,500,000,000 in 1924, or four years after the two-year war. They went up $25,000,000 in 1925, another $50,000,000 in 1926, and the President said in his last budget speech that it might be possible to keep them to a minimum of $3,600,000,000 in 1927."

According to that analysis, the cost of the Federal Government's operations is again on the upgrade.

In Congressional and Administration circles there still is much difference of opinion as to what should be the fixed policy as to the war debts. The one set up by Congress in 1920 aims at the extinguishment of all but the portion covered by loans to other Governments in twenty-four years. Yields of tax acts beyond what was aimed at has carried that program beyond what was planned. This has been pleasing to the Treasury Department, which has held steadily to the traditional view of the Federal Government that debts should be extinguished as quickly as possible.

Paying Debts Quickly.

There has developed in Congress a faction which holds that there is no occasion for such speeding up of the extinguishment of the war debt, that Treasury surpluses and even some of the repayments on loans made by foreign Governments could be more profitably used for other purposes. Senator Simmons, the Democratic leader, has urged that some of the debt be left to the next generation, that even the portion not represented by war loans might be spread over a period of thirty-one years, one-half the time covered by the refunding arrangements with foreign countries. Others declare payment of the entire debt should be spread over a period of sixty-two years.

If such a policy were adopted the Government's scheduled needs would be reduced, with an enlarged margin for further tax slicing or increasing of appropriations. But the cost of carrying the debt would decline more slowly than hitherto. That cost has been reduced nearly one-fourth since the war, in most part by reduction of the total owed and in other part by refundings and savings in interest.

The question as to rate of extinguishment of the war debt is not to figure prominently in the handling of the tax problem by Congress during the next year or two.

NEW SCENE ADDED TO DRAMA OF THE TOMBS

Recent Gun Battle One of Many Outbreaks in History of Prison

By EDWARD H. SMITH.

NEW YORK witnessed a desperate battle a few days ago, when three armed convicts tried to break out of the Tombs and fought to the death before crowds in the windows of surrounding high buildings. The echoes of this episode are still swelling into official investigations and charges against keepers of the famous New York jail—all of which rings most familiarly in the ears of the historian. For the lockup in Centre Street has furnished many a dramatic incident in the past and its story is dotted with astonishing escapes and blurred with indignant investigations.

Only the older generation remembers that the present Tombs building is the second to occupy the site, and very few people are able to tell how the prison got its name. The ground on which the jail and the surrounding buildings stand was once Collect Pond, a small body of water that furnished the city its drinking supply until after the Revolution. It was filled in for sanitary reasons and to engage idle workmen during an early financial depression.

In 1833, the old Bridewell in City Hall Park having long since become a disgrace, it was decided to build a new jail on the filled land. Some political worthy on the Jersey shore having then lately returned from a trip to Egypt and published a book containing drawings of Nilotic columns, temples, pylons and capitals, the architect of the new prison was inspired thereby and turned out a building of two stories (two cell tiers in each), whose front was of dark granite in the Pharaonic manner, with the wings of Horus, the disk of Aton, the serpent and the lotus for decorations. The heavy columns and deep recesses of the entrance struck the public imagination at once. It looked like the entrance to a mausoleum. Some one called the place the Tombs, and the name stuck.

The old Tombs was completed in 1838. It had 150 cells for men and 40 for women. For more than half a century, or until the electric chair was adopted and all executions transferred to the State prisons in 1889, the Tombs was the scene of New York City's executions, fifty-five men having hanged from its gibbet in that period.

The Tombs was only four years old when it passed through one of the most nerve-racking days of its long history. On Sept. 17, 1841, John C. Colt, a brother of Samuel Colt, who invented the revolver, killed Samuel Adams, a printer, in a quarrel over money. Colt, out of some madness, put the body into a box and shipped it by steamer to New Orleans. The crime was traced to him and he was convicted of murder and sentenced to be hanged on Nov. 18, 1842. The hour of his execution was set for 4 in the afternoon.

At 11 o'clock that morning Colt was married in his cell to Miss Caroline Hensbaw, his loyal sweetheart. After the ceremony the bride spent a few minutes with her husband and was then asked to withdraw with her party, while preparations for the hanging proceeded. A little before 3 o'clock Colt made a last request—that he be allowed to spend his final hour alone, to write letters and meditate. The warden could see no harm in it and had the guard withdraw.

Dagger Cheats the Rope.

Meantime the crowd had gathered outside in all the streets upon which the prison fronted. But at half past 3 o'clock smoke began to pour from the cupola of the jail and the fire companies came rushing, forced the crowd aside and scaled the roof to put out the blaze. It was past 4 o'clock before the job had been done and attention could be returned to the doomed man.

The Rev. Mr. Anthon, the chaplain, was sent to Colt's cell to prepare him for his death. But Anthon came dashing back down the stairs crying that Colt was dead. It was true. The man had written some farewell letters and plunged a dagger into his heart. An investigation yielded nothing save the obvious probability that the new Mrs. Colt had passed her husband the dagger in the course of their wedding embrace.

In 1858 Dr. Theodore Gallaudet made one of the most adroit escapes in the history of the Tombs. The doctor had engaged in a fight with Cranston, manager of the old New York Hotel, and settled the issue by hitting the hotel keeper on the head with a water carafe. For this, in spite of his plea that he had been harassed and attacked by Cranston, the physician was sentenced to serve a year in the penitentiary.

On Nov. 20, in the late afternoon, he left the Tombs in charge of two keepers on his way to the Island. Going uptown he suggested in the most courtly manner that he would be a long time in quod and he would like to give a little dinner to his friendly guards before he passed behind steel. The turnkeys agreed and the trio went to a fashionable restaurant, ordered a complete dinner and quantities of drink.

When the delighted keepers were sufficiently mellow, the good doctor suggested that he would like to go to the washroom. He left his hat and coat behind and neither keeper accompanied him, their legs being a bit heavy and their fellowship ripe. Dr. Gallaudet, of course, walked out into the night and away. He was next heard of in France and he never came back to "do his year."

Five years later, in 1863, the record of the jail is marked with the characteristic escape of Conrad Schrader, a slender German with a penchant for fisticuffs and other methods of assault. He occupied Cell No. 50 on the second tier with two others. Life in the cell bored Schrader and he looked about. By turning his cot on end he was able to reach the small, high window. Here, after prying around, he discovered that time had rusted the screws which held the iron window lintel in place. With nothing more than some scraps of tin and iron, he managed to get the old screws out and remove the lintel, making a space about two feet wide, but only six and a half inches high.

He stripped, soaped his body, managed to thrust his head sidewise through the aperture and then to wriggle his body out, pushing with his feet against the upended bed. His pals tossed his clothes after him and he dressed in the yard. He mounted the top of the old cookhouse, gained the wall and dropped safely to the street, some twenty-five feet. He was caught a month later in a Bowery saloon, having first beaten several policemen. The escape is recorded because it was the first of its type.

The following year, 1864, saw the exploit of James Dunn, a truly remarkable escaper. He was in the Tombs charged with burglary and bound for Sing Sing. Some one smuggled a saw to him and James, reversing his habits and natural process, burgled his way out. But a policeman happened to be promenading in Elm (now Lafayette) Street and took the bold burglar back to his home in the cell.

Dunn went to Sing Sing, where he shortly achieved immortality in the pantheon of escapers. He carved a wooden decoy duck, painted it to suit, attached to it a seven-foot length of rubber tubing, stolen from the prison hospital, made a crude mask out of some sheet rubber and passed the tube through it in such fashion that it could be taken into the mouth.

The New Jack Sheppard.

Thus equipped, Dunn waited an opportunity and plunged into the Hudson from the end of the prison marble docks. By weighting his pockets with a few stones he managed to swim under the surface for several hundred yards, breathing through the tube, whose upper end was fast to the neck of the wooden duck. When he was out of sight and range of the wall guards he landed, discarded his novel paraphernalia and got away. He was caught again a year or so later. And when he tried to repeat the duck ruse a few years later he was received at the end of a riot gun when he emerged.

In these days the Tombs was repeatedly the home of John Mahony, a jailbreaker of such prowess that Warden Charles Sutton called him the "new Jack Sheppard" and the "Modern Baron Trenck." The fact is that neither Trenck nor Sheppard amounted to much as escapers, their reputations consisting of one part deed and nine parts literary inflation. Mahony, on the other hand, was surely one of the greatest jailbreakers ever born. He first escaped from the Tombs, over the walls, at the age of 16, in 1860. He next escaped from Riker's Island, the army concentration camps on the Potomac, the Washington jail, Andersonville prison, the Tombs again, Sing Sing, Charleston prison, the New York penitentiary, the Tombs for a third time, the detention pen in the Criminal Courts Building, a moving train and the Police Headquarters pen in Philadelphia.

The escape from Sing Sing was made by slipping off the ball and chain, which had been attached to his ankle for months, stealing the coat and hat of a contract labor superintendent, jumping into this man's buggy, hiding his striped trousers under the lap robe and boldly driving up to the prison gate, which was open. But as Mahony passed out he was recognized. He lashed the horse and drove 200 yards under a hail of bullets from the walls, got clean away and was not caught for a year or more. On the occasions of his fourth and last flight from the Tombs, in the early '80s, the convicts rose and cheered for ten minutes when the news got to them. He was the hero of every jail in the East. Yet he died in Dannemora—mirabile dictu!

Perhaps the most celebrated of all Tombs escapes was compassed in the Fall of 1873. William J. Sharkey, a minor politician and gambler, who had shot his friend and fellow gamester, Robert S. Dunn, had been condemned to death and all efforts to save him had failed. In those days visitors were permitted to enter the jail with the famous red tickets issued by the warden on application, and talk to imprisoned men of all ranks through the bars of their cells. The custom was to give each visitor one of the tickets, which he showed upon entering and was forced to surrender in order to get out.

On Nov. 19, a little after noon, Maggie Jourdan, Sharkey's sweetheart, was admitted with the usual red ticket and went at once to his cell, No. 40—soon to be famous in every variety, burlesque and minstrel show in the country. She stood there chatting and commiserating with Sharkey when Mrs. Wesley Allen, wife of a prisoner lately transferred to Sing Sing, arrived to visit another inmate whose acquaintance she had made while her husband was being detained in the Tombs. Mrs. Allen paused for some minutes at Cell 40, where she laughed and gossiped with Maggie Jourdan and Sharkey. Then she passed on to visit the other prisoner.

A few minutes after 1 o'clock, while the keepers who had been at the gate an hour before were at lunch, a large woman in a voluminous black gown,

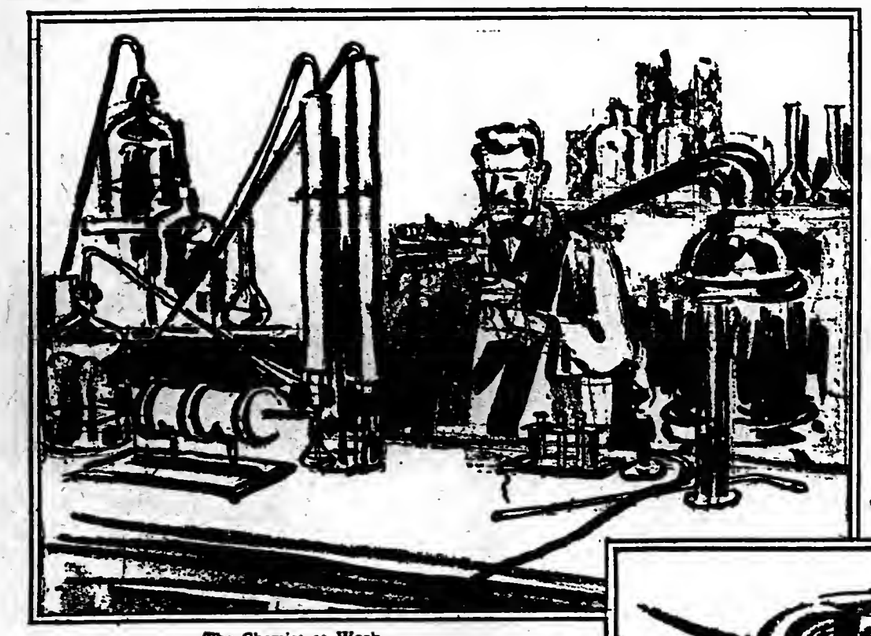
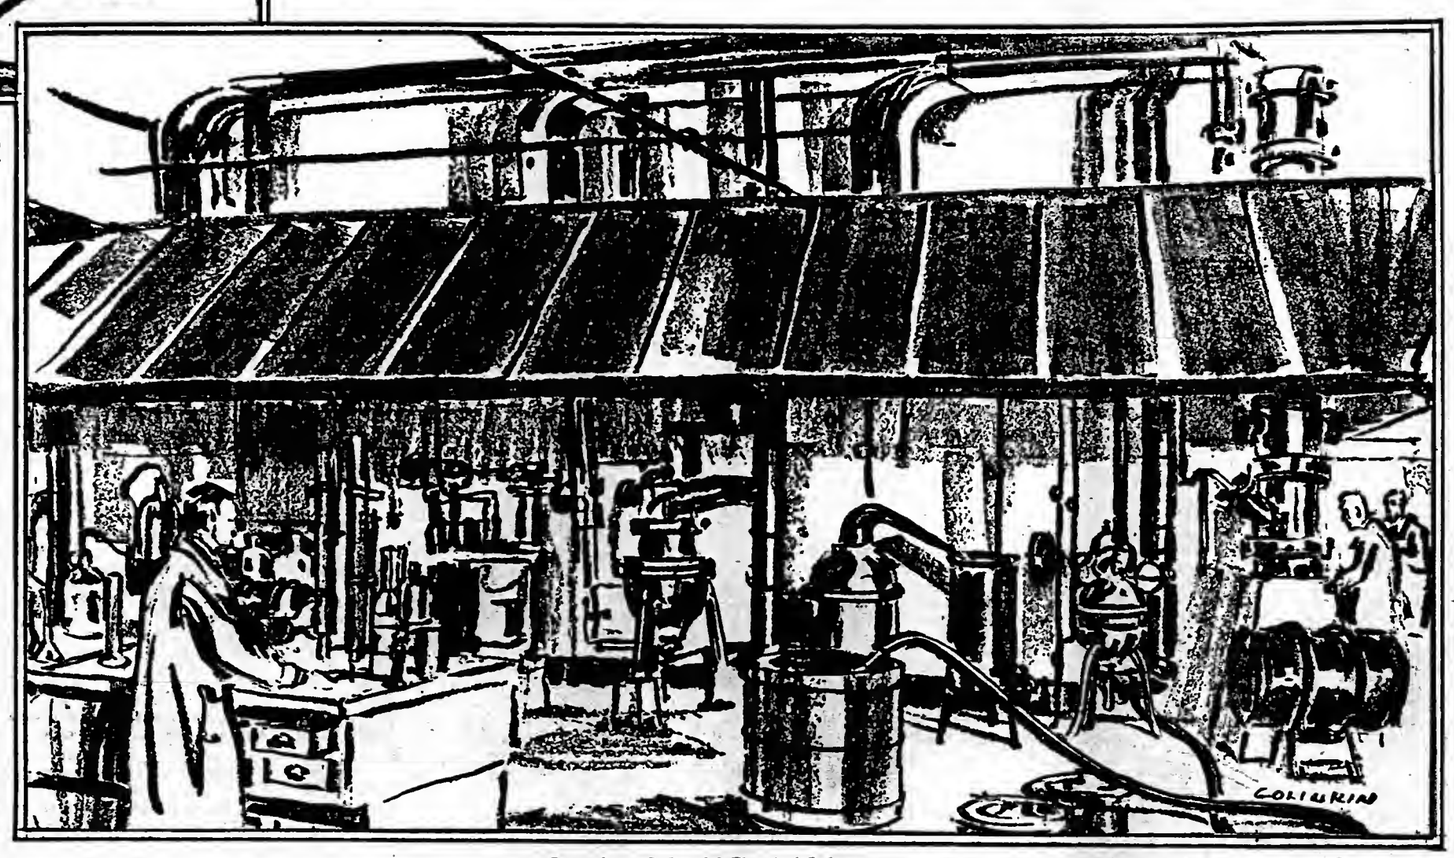
CATALYSIS IS INDUSTRY'S NEW MAGIC MAKER

This Mysterious Process Joins Two Chemicals to Produce Another Compound—Releases Powerful Atomic Forces



The Chemist at Work.



Scene in an Industrial Chemical Laboratory.

By VALENTINE KARLYN.

A FEW weeks ago Audibert, a French scientist, announced that he had experimentally succeeded in producing synthetic petroleum derivatives by a catalytic process. With somewhat premature elation the Director of the National Bureau of Liquid Combustibles heralded the day when France would cease to pay the United States and other nations about three billion francs annually for gasoline and would manufacture in gigantic factories all the liquid fuel she needs.

Audibert is but one of a score of chemists who have attacked the problem of producing liquid fuel synthetically with bituminous coal or with nothing but invisible gases as their raw material—and a catalyst. Patart of France, Professor Franz Fischer, director of the Institute for Coal Research at Mülheim-on-the-Ruhr, and Dr. Friedrich Bergius of Heidelberg are the pioneers in this effort to provide gasoline and other petroleum products for a day when our oil wells will have been pumped dry—a day less than half a century distant.

That petroleum substitutes will ultimately be made in factories is a foregone conclusion when more is known about catalysis, a comparatively new agent in chemistry with infinite industrial and scientific possibilities. Within the last twenty years it has been practically applied in enriching the world with new products and in accelerating and cheapening processes by which many old products are made.

Making Nature Move Faster.

Some imaginative chemist once called a catalyst a "chemical parson." It marries two chemicals to produce a new compound, without itself being in the least affected by the ceremony. And usually it stands ready to wed hundreds of chemical couples one after another. Like most picturesque and easily grasped similes, this one is not perfect. It is incomplete because even the most resistant elements are probably combining with others at a rate so slow that we never notice it. One of the most inert of all elements is nitrogen, a gas comprising four-fifths of the air we breathe. It takes tremendous energy to make nitrogen form a compound like nitric acid or ammonia; but for all we know nature, which reckons not with time by the clock, sees to it that nitrogen is imperceptibly combining with the oxygen of the air as the first step in a long series of successive chemical changes that ultimately yield solid nitrogen compounds, such as the vast deposits of nitrates found on the west coast of South America.

What a catalyst really does is to speed up the slow processes of nature. Take oxidation, for example. What most of us call "burning," the chemist calls "oxidation." When iron rusts it oxidizes; when coal burns, something combines with the oxygen of the air. The rusting of iron and the burning of coal—both are oxidation processes. But what a difference in the time required for iron to rust and for a pound of coal to burn! Days and weeks elapse in the one case; minutes in the other.

Here we have a lesson in chemistry which is of importance in trying to understand catalysis. Different substances "burn" or oxidize at different rates. Chemical reaction-times obviously vary. A catalyst is a substance which changes the reaction-time. Usually it hastens the forming of chemical combinations—reduces to minutes or hours processes which naturally consume months, years, even centuries. It is a lash to lazy atoms. Hence the definition of a catalyst framed by Wilhelm Ostwald, one of the greatest chemists of our time, is regarded with more favor than any other. To him a catalyst is a body "that changes the velocity of a reaction without itself being changed by the process."

Fat From Cottonseed Oil.

Although catalysis has been a familiar chemical phenomenon for nearly a century, it remained for Sabatier and Senderens, two French chemists of our own day, to usher in the era of industrial catalysis with a discovery which made it possible to convert vegetable oils into hard, appetizing cooking fats and the vilest and most nauseating fish-oils into soaps that prima donnas and motion-picture beauties now endorse. Like scores of other chemists, Sabatier and Senderens knew that cottonseed oil contains compounds of three so-called fatty acids—a linoleate, an oleate and a stearate. The stearate (stearine is its more familiar form) is hard and solid at ordinary temperatures and is the most valuable of the three. The other two are liquid, which explains why vegetable oils are liquid and not solid at ordinary temperatnres.

The difference between the oleate and the stearate is merely a matter of hydrogen. If it were possible to make the oleate take up two paltry hydrogen atoms it would become a stearate and its commercial value multiplied many times. But how? Mixing hydrogen with the oleic acid, as we mix sugar with coffee, is utterly futile. Sabatier and Senderens brought the vapor of oleic acid into contact with hydrogen, but in the presence of nickel powder. A magic change occurred. The oleic acid took up two atoms of hydrogen. It became stearate—a hard fat. Nickel was the catalyst that wrought this chemical wonder.

Another Discovery.

Then came Dr. Wilhelm Normann, a German chemist, and discovered that it was quite unnecessary to vaporize the oleic acid. He simply bubbled the hydrogen gas through cottonseed oil with which nickel powder had been mixed. Before his astonished eyes he saw the oil congeal into a hard, lard-like fat. He repeated the experiment with scores of oils. Olive oil became like tallow, and so did linseed and fish oils. The nickel was removed for use again by squeezing the fat through filter presses.

The rest is now a matter of industrial history. Cottonseed, for which there were not many uses, suddenly became a most valuable raw material. A whole new industry has been built up on the conversion of its oil into a substitute for lard. Normann's patents have been exploited in every civilized country and have become the subject-matter of some of the most bitterly contested infringement suits in the history of patent law.

Whaling, which had languished as a gainful pursuit when kerosene, then gas, and finally the electric light were successively introduced, has recovered its former glory. Gun-harpoons of diabolic ingenuity have been devised to kill the whale with anything but sportsmanlike dispatch. He represents now so many hundred pounds of potential soap. In fact, whale oil is so much in demand that varieties of whale scarcely hunted at all in the halcyon days of New Bedford and Nantucket have become as valuable as so many animated gold mines. International conferences have been held to consider the whale and his highly precarious future, for the demands of catalytic chemistry threaten him with extinction. Biologists of Scandinavian countries even study the plankton, on which he feeds, so that life in the ocean may be pleasanter for him. And the whale is not the only sea animal that has fallen a prey to the catalytic chemist. Every fish that secretes a decent amount of oil becomes a shining mark.

The success achieved in converting low-grade vegetable and fish oils into high-grade fats and soaps has had a profound commercial effect. The paint and varnish industry has been completely transformed. Linseed-oil varnishes are almost as extinct as the dodo, in the automobile factory. Enamels and coatings catalytically made from nitrocellulose (guncotton reduced to liquid form, with the "gun" taken out) have supplanted them. Catalytic accelerators now speed up the process of vulcanizing rubber. Sulphuric acid and chlorine gas are made more cheaply than ever by their means.

The fermentation of sugar to produce alcohol, or the conversion of wine into vinegar, now proceeds more rapidly than of old with catalytic aid. Even the dairy industry is not likely to escape the catalytic chemist; already it has been found that the coagulation of milk by rennet in cheese-making can be hastened with a catalyst. Indeed, every chemical reaction can probably be influenced catalytically. At least, that is Ostwald's view.

Platinum, sodium, mercury, nickel, iron, cobalt, all the precious metals, are solid catalysts. Lucky accidents still play a part in the discovery of catalysts suitable for accelerating special processes. One of the great German coal-tar works needed phthalic acid in the manufacture of synthetic indigo. There was good chemical reason to believe that the acid could be obtained by treating naphthalene (familiar to us as moth-balls) with sulphuric acid. In practice the good chemical reason proved to be no reason at all. In other words, phthalic acid refused to appear, or very little of it. A clumsy chemist's assistant lowered a thermometer into the tank to take the temperature of the mixture. He broke the thermometer and the mercury flowed out. Then a miracle happened. The mass became active. The chemists stood around, watched and wondered. Then they tested the compound. The naphthalene had been reduced to phthalic acid. Mercury proved to be the much-sought catalyst.

There is something very life-like, very human, about a catalyst. Like a person, it becomes fatigued after having officiated at many chemical marriages in rapid succession. To this extent it often does suffer a change, whatever the classic definitions may say to the contrary. Often a catalyst, like platinum, can be cleaned and thus refreshed. Such a catalyst is said to have been "poisoned." While hardly a scientific explanation of what actually occurs, "poisoning" fairly describes the weariness and sluggishness that characterize an overworked catalyst. In fact, some particularly energetic catalysts are deliberately poisoned by the addition of foreign bodies in order to control and subdue them.

The effect is much like that which follows the administration of an opiate to a highly excitable, nervous man. It slows the catalyst down—makes it more amenable to control. The very "poison" that slows down one catalyst may spur another to furious activity. Probably far more would be known both about catalysts and their poisons if it were easier than it is to obtain absolutely pure chemicals. There is evidence enough to indicate that the minutest trace of some chemical may have a profound effect on a catalyst and the poison to which it peculiarly responds.

Also Poison Human Body.

It is strange that many of the elements and compounds that poison catalysts also poison the human body. Arsenic, prussic acid, bichloride of mercury, iodine—all are poisons both to catalysts and animals. In fact some catalysts are more sensitive than the human organism to poisons. Sulphur in fairly large quantities will do no particular harm to the country boy who has to take it in the Spring in accordance with family medical traditions. But as little as one-tenth of 1 per cent. of sulphur will "kill" an iron catalyst, and one-hundredth of 1 per cent. will render it practically unfit for use in making synthetic ammonia by the Haber process.

The curious effect of "poisons" suggests at once an analogy with the human body. If a catalyst can be drugged into semi-somnolence and if a raving lunatic can be lulled by opiates, is the life-process itself influenced by catalysts? Some chemists have been daring enough to think so.

Catalysts Put Off Germany's Defeat.

It was undoubtedly an expert knowledge of catalysts that enabled Germany to stave off defeat in the last war as long as she did. She needed explosives as much as she needed men and food. Explosives are compounds of nitrogen, and the chief source of nitrogen has been for generations the saltpeter deposits of Chile. Wherever there is cheap water-power it is possible to convert the nitrogen gas of the air into a nitrogenous compound which the chemist uses as one of his raw materials in the manufacture of high explosives. The water-power is applied in generating electrical heat, by which the chemically stubborn nitrogen is made to combine with the oxygen of the air.

Nature set the example eons ago. Whenever lightning flashes between earth and sky or between cloud and cloud she is reducing a little atmospheric nitrogen. Germany could not apply electricity. The supply of Chilean nitrate was cut off. She had no great water-falls, and there was scarcely enough coal for her industries.

It so happened that Dr. Fritz Haber, long before the war, had been trying to make ammonia—a nitrogen compound—catalytically. All he had to do was to bring one volume of nitrogen together in unholy and polygamous matrimony with three volumes of hydrogen. This seems simple. In reality it is discouragingly difficult. Merely squeezing the gases together under high pressure was of no use. He needed a catalyst to perform the marriage ceremony, and he found it in iron.

The synthesis of ammonia by the Haber process is probably the most difficult feat thus far chronicled in the annals of chemical engineering. Steel vessels had to be made which would not burst at a pressure of 3,000 pounds to the square inch and at a temperature approaching red heat; the steel had to withstand the effect of occluded hydrogen and ammonia gases; the joints had to resist the pressure and also the vertical and lateral stresses set up by different temperatures.

Haber succeeded brilliantly. When he received the Noble Prize in 1920, he delivered an address in Christiania in which he said: "Germany is now producing enough fixed nitrogen for its own use and does not need any imports." He could have made the same statement at the very height of the war when German artillery was using up more high explosives in a week than pre-war estimates of the German General Staff had established as the amount required in two months.

Next War "More Catalytic."

An enormous Haber ammonia plant had been built at a cost of $50,000,000 at Oppau to make nitrogen in the form of ammonia. Six thousand men were employed in that establishment to produce 200 tons of ammonia a day. Stupendous as the plant was it proved inadequate for the needs of war. At Leuna another plant was built in 1916 in eleven months, and by 1918 it was producing 400 tons of ammonia a day. The Oppau plant blew up in September, 1921, for reasons that have never been definitely determined, although a committee of experts came to the conclusion that a catastrophe which had wiped out a whole community was not caused by the enormous pressures demanded by the Haber process. The Leuna plant is still in operation. In fact its capacity has been doubled since the war. Germany is now "fixing" about 425,000 tons of nitrogen annually from the air—the equivalent of 2,700,000 tons of Chilean nitrate once converted into fertilizers and explosives.

To make explosives, nitric acid as well as ammonia is needed. Years before Haber had begun his investigations Ostwald had shown how nitric acid could be made catalytically by oxidizing ammonia. By combining the catalytic processes of Haber and Ostwald Germany was able to fight on. If more had been known about catalysis it is conceivable that Germany might have avoided starvation by catalytically creating synthetic foodstuffs. As it is chemists have but crossed the threshold of catalytic knowledge.

German chemists have no monopoly of catalytic knowledge. Other nations fought battles with the aid of catalysis. Charcoal and kaolin (a form of clay) were used in this country as catalytic agents in the production of phosgene and mustard gas. Indeed many of the war gases were made with the aid of catalysts. When the next war devastates whole nations it will be even more a catalytic war than the last.

It is one of the commonplaces of science that practice usually precedes theory. Fifty years ago no one could formulate a theory which would satisfactorily explain the phenomena of electricity, but electrical engineers nevertheless proceeded to design and build generators and later to wire houses and factories with electric lighting systems. Is catalytic action chemical, physical, electrical or what-ant in nature? No one knows exactly. Perhaps science is dealing with a new force—a force as strange as electricity was to Franklin. Catalytically speaking, we are not even half-educated. A South Sea Islander does not know what fire is; yet he cooks with it successfully. A modern chemist does not know what catalysis is, but applies it amazingly in establishing new industries that produce useful compounds valued at hundreds of millions.

Because of this ignorance no chemist is willing to limit the possibilities of catalysis. No prediction is so fantastic that it may not become a reality. Dr. Mittasch, director of the great Badische Anilin und Soda Fabrik of Mannheim, has definitely announced that by catalytically treating water-gas (made by passing steam over red-hot coal or coke) a dozen different alcohols and useful acids can be obtained, not to mention liquid fuels of the most diverse properties. Even ethyl alcohol, the variety abhorred by prohibitionists, will be made catalytically without the awkward use of grain and yeast, so that it may become necessary to amend our anti-alcohol laws to forbid not only the licensed distillation but clandestine catalysis as well.

Caused Market Slump.

Mittasch is one of the leading authorities on catalysis in the world. It was under his direction that the Badische Anilin und Soda Fabrik made a shipload of methanol, dumped it here at a profit despite a stiff tariff and caused a flurry in the New York stock market. Methanol is a fancy chemical name for wood alcohol. Patart showed how it could be made synthetically. The Germans picked up the clue and followed it. Now the Badische Anilin und Soda Fabrik is producing it at the rate of ten to twenty tons a day and at a cost of only 20 cents a gallon.

In the United States we still chop down trees, reduce them to chips and slivers and cook off the wood alcohol from the chips and slivers in stills. Now comes this German company and makes not only wood alcohol from mere water-gas, but other alcohols indispensable in the manufacture of liquors. The next step is the commercial catalytic manufacture of a host of solids, among them a cheap unbreakable, transparent substance for glass; for synthetic indigo and synthetic ammonia. Besides the field of catalysis in treating urea and formaldehyde, the basis of these solids, a few more achievements in catalysis, such as synthetic methanol, and Germany will pay off her reparations with a celerity not contemplated by the framers of the Dawes plan.

Future Possibilities of Catalysis.

Profound as our ignorance may be, this much seems certain: Catalysis is the key that liberates tremendous atomic forces, and therein lies its power for good and evil. The electric light, which now seems the acme of perfection in illuminants, is unbelievably inefficient. Catalysis may give us the ideal "cold" light. Only 2 per cent. of the electric energy so cumbersomely produced by burning coal under a boiler to raise steam, which, in turn, drives an engine coupled to a generator, appears in the incandescent bulb as light; the rest is wasted as heat. The firefly reverses the ratio and achieves cold light.

"Cold light will come some day, and we know enough now to predict that we shall make use of a catalytic agent to speed up the reaction which gives rise to light," Professor Wilder D. Bancroft confidently predicted before an international meeting of chemists. To which he added: "If we could cause the rain clouds which now pass tantalizingly over many of the arid regions to precipitate we could increase the fertility and consequently the value of these lands to an unbelievable extent. This is not 'rain-making' in the popular sense; but it is a matter which is quite within the limit of accomplishments."

Dazzling as this prospect may be, catalysis may accomplish still more. Its future is even terrifying. Sir Oliver Lodge once declared that a spoonful of matter contains enough energy, if we could but unlock and control it, to lift the whole German fleet, then sunk in Scapa Flow, and deposit it on the mountains of Scotland. Remember, catalysis may enable us to unleash atomic forces. If we ever succeed in making a pinch of radium do the work of half a dozen Niagaras, it will possibly be with the aid of a catalyst.

We are checked now, perhaps for our good, because we cannot speed up atomic disintegrations and combinations which are progressing, even in the case of radium, with exasperating slowness. Perhaps we may have to evolve into a race of highly ethical supermen before we dare loose the terrific forces imprisoned in every kitchen utensil, in every brick. Sir Oliver Lodge has openly doubted our intellectual and moral fitness to experiment with unlimited atomic energy. If he is right and our childishly destructive propensities are not curbed perhaps, a century or two hence, some wise, all-knowing astronomer on an inhabited globe a hundred million light-years distant may see a sudden glow where our sun and his attendant planets now swim.

"What's that?" some alert student may ask him.

"Probably some half-savage, semi-moral primitive imbecile has blown up a solar system. Toying with radium, perhaps. Didn't know enough about catalysis."

ESPERANTO GAINS NEW ADVOCATES

Use of Auxiliary Language Is Urged to Promote Peace of The World—5,000,000 Have Learned to Speak It

ESPERANTO, which has been promoted as a means of explicit speech and clearer understanding between races, was used recently in a London marriage ceremony to give extra emphasis to the bride's "I will." When the bride signified her willingness to enter the wedded state by replying "mi volas," it was recognized that Esperanto was entering the practical realm of serious contract.

In recent years the world has greatly increased its interest in the so-called auxiliary languages. About 300 of them have been devised in times past. A language that all nations could clearly understand and easily learn was first discussed in the Roman Empire. In the days of the Caesars a single world language was thought necessary because there was only one world power; but the twentieth century has evolved a League of Nations which seeks unity and understanding among many powers.

The project for a world language has long been the plaything of philosophers. Advocates of an international language have in the past included numerous philosophers and scientists, among whom are Roger Bacon, Descartes, Pascal, Locke, Voltaire, and Diderot. Leibnitz thought out a number languags, which even now, since one speaks so lightly of billions, seems highly complex. Another German devised an artificial lingo, Volapük, as forbidding as its name sounds. It was a jumble of German and English, comprehensible to the natives of neither land. At about this time Dr. L. L. Zamenhof emerged from the seclusion of his library with the much more pleasing Esperanto. Its name carried a hope which in the past four decades has become a reality. Esperanto is today being spoken, it is reported, by 5,000,000 people.

The Esperanto movement began in 1887, and only small progress was made during its first ten years, and that chiefly in Russia. After the lapse of a decade, a start was made to introduce the Zamenhof idea among the Norwegians and Swedes. They, too, became its advocates. Then France developed interest, and soon became a stronghold for the new language system. From France this movement extended to Germany, thence to Austria, Switzerland, Italy and England. In the latter country thirty societies were organized within a year of the introduction of Esperanto.

Of all the synthetic languages Esperanto remains the most popular. Congresses are held annually to which the initiated flock from the four corners of the globe. Newspapers in many countries contain articles in Esperanto; for example, a German daily publishes a column of financial news in that language, many medical journals in Japan print technical treatises in it and a new Russian scientific magazine uses Esperanto in its leading editorial.

European statesmen consider the spread of Esperanto of such importance that they have persuaded several Governments to give official recognition to the movement and to aid it financially. In some countries it has been introduced in the schools and has become a part of the compulsory curriculum. In the United States it is beginning to gain a considerable foothold. This Winter four schools, two in New York, one in Boston and one in Washington, have added it to the list of studies they have to offer.

In San Francisco the study of Esperanto is obligatory in the Montezuma School, and the Stanford University gives a credit to all who have taken the course. Vassar has placed it in its curriculum, and for the first time last Summer it appeared on the program of Columbia University. Many educators see not only an inherent value in Esperanto, but find it of use in the study of other languages, the stern logic of its fundamental principles giving, it is said, the pupil a better comprehension of language construction.

In Europe, where one of the main difficulties in the path of international accord lies in the differences in language, Esperanto has already received wide endorsement from legislative bodies representing millions of people. The League of Nations Assembly has requested its member nations to accept Esperanto on an equal basis with seven other plain languages in telegraph and cable dispatches; the World Congress of Chambers of Commerce has expressed its desire that it be adopted as a common commercial language, and the World Conference of Academies of Natural and Applied Sciences has pronounced itself in favor of using Esperanto as the international language of science.

Several French, English and American publishers have undertaken publication of Esperanto works. Various Esperanto publishing houses in different countries turn out many books each year. More than 5,000 volumes, including textbooks, translated and original works, are now listed in the Esperanto catalogues. Some large commercial firms are using this system for cable and telegraphic purposes. Several of the standard typewriters are equipped with Esperanto keyboards, and in consequence stenographers are learning the use of the language.

Thus Esperanto is not only the language of the intelligentsia. Throughout Central Europe it is popular among the working classes, who consider it sensible and easily learned. The grammar consists of only sixteen rules. The verbs are all regular, there being only one conjugation and only twelve verb endings.

A Strangely Familiar Sound.

All nouns end in o, adjectives in a, verbs in i and adverbs in e. To those who hear it, it has a strangely familiar sound, as of some tongue learned in early youth, for the root words are taken from the prevailing languages. There are specialized vocabularies in Esperanto, as, for example, terms adapted to law, science or affairs of state.

But Esperantists see in their language not merely words held together on a framework of grammar. To them it is a medium for gaining world peace, a common language in which all peoples can express themselves with clarity—for it aims at clarity, not subtlety—and they contend its use will bring about better international understanding. The auxiliary language has the advantage that it is no man's and every man's language; it is free from all thought of nationalism.

The need for a means of expression that will help men to cast aside all feeling of race and nationality has never been so urgent, the advocates of an international tongue assert. In every other field, they say, society has developed adequate means of intercommunication. Now that the nations of the world are aiming at closer cooperation the time has come when they must be able to exchange thoughts freely and without misunderstanding.

In the League of Nations, where there are already English and French sessions, the business of which must be translated, the South Americans have asked for Spanish sessions. Should the Germans add to this a plea for their mother tongue, and should both be granted, the league would stand a fair chance of rivaling the Tower of Babel.

In New York City the International Auxiliary Language Association of the United States, of which Dr. Herbert N. Shenton of Columbia University is the secretary, is investigating synthetic languages. The work of the organization is compared to the research done in a laboratory; it is without bias or partiality.

The question of a common form of speech is being viewed from all angles, and psychologists, linguists and sociologists, American and foreign, are giving the association the benefit of their studies and observations.

On the General Advisory Committee of the International Auxiliary Language Association in the United States are: John J. Carty, Frederick G. Cottrell, Mrs. James S. Cushman, Dr. John H. Finley, Arthur A. Hammerschlag, Clarence H. Howard, Mrs. James Leeds Laidlaw, Bishop William Lawrence, Sidney E. Mezes, Arthur E. Morgan, Mrs. Davis H. Morris, Samuel W. Stratton and Mrs. Charles L. Tiffany.

AFRICA'S WEALTH AGAIN CALLS TO WHITE RACES

The Dark Continent, After Defeating Many of Their Schemes, Holds New Enticing Trade Prospects

By ELGIN E. GROSECLOSE.

SOMETHING about Africa, the "Dark Continent," will not let the diplomatists and the armies rest. Spain, at the price of bloodspilling and revolution, stubbornly clutches her African possessions; an African campaign has until only recently continued to drain the French exchequer and take French livee; Italy, forgetful of the terrible battle she once lost in Abyssinia, is scheming with Great Britain to renew her policy of penetration; while lastly Germany, left as a result of Versailles without a foot of African soil, is again turning with longing eyes and watering mouth toward the great continent to the south.

The impulse back of all this is the hope of reward, the mysterious enchantment of treasures to be won, some unaccountable optimism that leads the statesmen of Europe to believe that America, once they can speak the magic word, will open like the cave of Ali Baba and yield untold riches.

In this, Europe only continues the tradition of the centuries. Africa has been a lure and a mystery to the white races since the dawn of time. Egypt is its smile. In that pleasant valley where the soil is rich, the sun warm, the water never failing, the white races have seen always a promise of greater treasures beckoning from the murky distances beyond. And so from Herodotus down to Livingstone they have gone in, they have searched, they have fought and for the most part have come out empty-handed.

Struggle for African Territory.

Lust for African possessions followed hard upon the heels of nineteenth century explorations, and international conflicts hard upon lust. For twenty-five years rivalry for ascendancy in Egypt and the Niger Valley alienated France from Britain and twice brought the two nations to the verge of war. During the same time Tunis, then Tripoli, and finally Abyssinia, embittered the relations between France and Italy. Germany entered the game late, and her chief fruit was the spleen she developed against the entire world. Imperialism in Africa, without doubt, was an important cause of the World War.

The year 1880 marks the beginning of the European scramble for African territory. Of the 11,262,000 square miles and 300,000,000 people which constitute the Dark Continent, less than 1,000,000 square miles and 10,000,000 people were, prior to 1880, under European domination. By 1890, 6,000,000 square miles had been annexed by Great Britain, Germany, France, Belgium and Portugal. By 1914 the whole continent, with the exception of Abyssinia (450,000 square miles and 8,000,000 population) and Liberia (40,000 square miles and 2,000,000 population) had been brought under European control. France had been the most successful so far as territory is concerned—her fingers withdrew from the grab-bag clutching 4,200,000 square miles of territory and 25,000,000 people. The prehensile feelers of Great Britain encircled 3,300,000 square miles of territory and 35,000,000 people. Germany was less successful, trailing with 1,100,000 square miles and 12,000,000 people. Behind these principal competitors followed Belgium, Portugal, Italy and Spain, each with territories of varying size and importance. Italy had been bashful and had remained outside until 1805, but, once having tasted the game, her appetite for African territory was satiated only after she lost a great army at the Battle of Adowa in an unsuccessful war with the kingdom of Abyssinia.

These answers to the African lure cost blood and soiled reputations. British penetration into Africa was accompanied by a series of wars—the Zulu War in 1879, the war for the conquest of Mashonoland in 1890, the Matabele War in 1893, the Boer War in 1899—all of them serious and expensive—while the acquisitions of other European powers were costly in proportion.

Africa's Wealth Exaggerated.

Yet, after all, has all this effort been justified? Cold and dry trade figures reveal that, so far at least, European statesmen have been fooled in thinking they were knocking at the doors of a great storehouse of wealth. African gold and diamond production, fabled in story and exploited to the utmost, is worth about half the cotton crop of Texas. The total imports of French Tunisia in 1924 were only $30,000,000 in value, a mere bagatelle in proportion to the mother country's total exports of $2,218,775,000. The total trade, both imports and exports, of all French North Africa (Algeria, Tunis and Morocco) is less than $450,000,000, whereas French expenses in the recent Riffian campaign are estimated as at least that much.

Egypt has been little more of a prize for Great Britain. The total trade of Egypt last year was valued at $587,000,000, and the British share in the imports amounted to around $75,000,000. This represents less than 40 per cent. of the value of British exports to Argentina, a country that has never been under British domination.

The total trade of all Africa, both imports and exports, is little more than half the value of the automobiles produced in this country, but European nations, like the English settlers now attracted to Tanganyika territory by the idea that they may establish there feudal estates of thousands of acres with black men at their beck and call, have been lured by the vast unpre-empted territories of that continent. These territories, given a certain color on the map, lend the appearance of a mighty empire to the controlling power, but many of them are actually worth little more than one good prosperous county in this country.

Africa will not yield up the treasures which she hides behind her veil until heavy capital investments have been made to bring them forth. Capitalists, however, have not shown any great enthusiasm in rushing in. Transportation is the basic factor in the economic development of any country and prospers in direct proportion to the wealth and trade turned up. In British tropical Africa privately owned railways constitute only a few hundred miles, the remainder being Government owned.

Not a White Man's Land.

Africa, essentially, is not a white man's country. The wide, heated plains of the Sahara, which form the bulk of the northern half of the continent, have an exceedingly scant rainfall, and the character of the country is such as to restrict white settlement to the northern coast fringe. And while the climate is in many respects immensely healthful, the means of livelihood are often scarce. Tropical Africa is, in spite of all the health work that has been carried on and the advances that have been made in the science of sanitation and treatment of tropical disease, for Europeans perhaps the most unhealthful spot in all the world.

But if Africa has inhospitably allowed the white man habitation only along the fringe of her spreading skirts, and has grudgingly kept under lock and key the chiefest of her treasures, it is impossible that the restless Jason-spirit of the white races will be content until this Medea has surrendered the golden fleece and has completely and fully put herself at the service of man.

Success, if it appears at all, glows most roseately in regard to the production of three great commodities, all of them of vital interest to the American people: cotton, rubber and oil.

Cotton spinning constitutes the fore, main and mizzen masts of the British ship of industry, and to spread these sails it takes around 4,000,000 bales of cotton annually. Two-thirds of this comes from the United States. Realizing their dependence upon the American supply, British statesmen have for years been directing their attention toward the cultivation of new sources of supply, within the Empire if possible.

Anxiety over the steady advance in prics of the American staple and the ravages of the boll weevil led to the passage of a resolution at the Tenth Congress of Chambers of Commerce of the Empire, held in London in 1924, urging the Government to continue to foster cotton-growing throughout the Empire, and particularly in Africa.

British Cotton From Egypt.

Egypt, which produces a quality of fibre excelled only by the finest sea island grades of this country, has figured large in British eyes, and under British influence immense sums have been poured out into damming the Nile in order to increase the acreage under cultivation. Cotton had been introduced into the Nile Valley as far back as 1820, but it was not until 1885, when the Delta barrage—the great system of dams at the mouth of the Nile—was completed that the production of the staple became noticeable in the world market. In 1902, when the Assuan Dam on the upper Nile was finished, Egypt became a factor in the world's cotton market. These two dams really convert the main body of the Nile River into one vast elongated lock, which permits man to control the entire water supply of the valley at his pleasure. As a result of these two engineering feats the production of cotton increased until last year the yield was 1,629,000 bales, or about equal to that of the State of Oklahoma, where cotton growing began some twenty-five years ago.

Encouraged by the success achieved in Egypt along the lower Nile, the British attempted the conquest of the upper river—the Sudan. At Gezira—literally "the Island"—where the river forks off into the Blue Nile and the White Nile, is a plain of about 4,000,000 acres in extent, or twice the total area under cultivation in Egypt. Last year, by the completion of one of a proposed series of dams, 300,000 acres were thrown open to cultivation. Work on the remainder has, however, been halted, owing to the immense cost of the undertaking—a cost which neither the British Government nor the Egyptian is willing at the present time to assume.

Although the map of Africa is dotted with areas indicated as being "cotton land," there are few which can be turned to account with the same ease as the Nile. On the upper Niger, which is under French control, there is an area where advantage can be taken of the flood water, and last December work was commenced on a barrage upon which 10,000,000 francs are to be expended during the current year. A half million bales is the estimated yield when the entire dam and the canal system is completed.

Just how much cotton can be eventually expected from the African Continent is an open question. W. H. Himbrey, manager of the British Cotton Growing Association, has estimated that the ultimate production of British Africa—Nigeria, the Sudan, Uganda, Nyassaland and the Union of South Africa—at 2,700,000 bales. Since the United States exported last year 8,532,000 bales, British African production, in addition to the Egyptian crop, would make a sizeable dent in our foreign market.

Until 1912 Africa stood next to South America in the amount of rubber supplied for world consumption. Then the plantation system was developed in British Malaya and the Dutch East Indies, and both Africa and South America passed out of the picture.

A cursory study of African topography, however, shows a vast belt, fourteen degrees of latitude in width and extending across the Continent, in which rubber either grows in a wild state or can be cultivated. The possibilities are so enticing that Herbert Hoover, Harvey Firestone and others interested in breaking the British and Dutch monopoly, began to investigate the actualities of the Dark Continent. An expedition was sent out by the United States Department of Commerce and an exhaustive first-hand survey of the situation was made.

The conclusions of this investigation, which are incorporated in a comprehensive report of the department, are that up the sleeve of Africa are many jewels, but the possibility of drawing them out is still the problem of the future. As with cotton, the difficulties in the case of rubber are lack of transport, inadequate labor supply and impossible climate, with special emphasis on labor supply and climate. Rubber production being restricted to the equatorial belt, the question of climate becomes paramount. Not only are the places few and scattered where the white man can live and work with any degree of comfort, but the depressing effects of torrid sun and enervating humidity inoculate the native. Native labor—which is so vital a factor in growing plantation rubber—is in these areas extremely indolent and capricious.

In one field of enterprise there seems to be a smile of hope on the countenance of Africa. Underneath the greater part of Southwest Africa flows what has been called the Black Golconda. Vast fields of petroleum, according to geologists, lie here ready to spout forth for the service of mankind. In these days, when cautious ones are predicting the rapid exhaustion of our domestic sources of supply, when the liquid fuel is assuming more and more importance as the source of power for the future, when the nations of the world are devoting their deep attention to assuring oil resources for their nationals, the prediction of great undiscovered deposits in the African Continent is important in the extreme.

Fortunately also for this country, this is one of the great undeveloped riches of Africa in which Americans are taking an active hand, and it is possible that in this black gold lies the hidden treasure which Africa has kept from the world all these years.

Oil croppings have been reported throughout an extensive territory, and at the present time test wells are being driven at strategic points. While the outcome of the tests is still in doubt, there has been sufficient promise to warrant continued prosecution of the work, and the future may envisage on the Dark Continent an oil field rivaling that of Baku on the Caspian or those of Persia and Mesopotamia.

It can hardly be denied that Africa is rich in other mineral, agricultural and forest products. Tobacco, for example, is becoming worthy of notice. The growth of the soothing weed has made remarkable development in Nyasaland. Twenty years ago there was less than 500 acres in cultivation; just before the war it had reached nearly 10,000, and the figures for 1924 show 20,600 acres under cultivation. The yield for 1924 was more than 8,000,000 pounds, which compares with 1,242,456,000 pounds in the United States. The average yield is considerably less than in this country—400 pounds to the acre compared with around 750 pounds here—but this quality is about equal to the Virginia leaf.

Race Friction Develops.

The output of minerals in South Africa, under aggressive English exploitation, is also becoming of interest. These products in 1925 were valued at $263,988,036, of which the 9,597,592 ounces of gold, valued at nearly $200,000,000, bulks largest; but there were 2,423,280 carats of diamonds mined, 13,007,141 tons of coal, 9,973 tons of copper and seventeen other minerals. It is not their amounts but the variety which draws our attention. The list includes chrome, asbestos, platinum, osmiridium, mica, graphite and others which have unfamiliar names but uses for householders and manufacturers all over the world.

Should Africa eventually be turned into a full-fledged white man's paradise, which optimists predict and history denies, there is still another question to be considered, and that is the ever-perplexing one of race. Race friction, which has had its innings even in the United States, the melting pot of the world, has reared in Africa in annoying fashion. The negroes in this country came chiefly from equatorial Africa, regions in which the people did not need any great amount of energy in order to live. In Northern and Southern Africa, and in the African highlands, the negro population has a somewhat different character. They are not savages in the accepted sense, they occupy villages, they till the soil, they have a high degree of pride and they are orators of no mean ability.

At the present time they have an apostle in the person of Clements Kadalie, the National Secretary of the Industrial and Commercial Workers' Union, which is a negro organization in South Africa, and under the vehement leadership of Kadalie the race problem in Africa is becoming amazingly articulate.

Taking as their goal the position of the negro in this country, the Bantu races are demanding equal political rights with the white man. At the present time the policy of the South African Government is for negro segregation, by which is meant a far wider application than separate railway coaches and waiting rooms.

Last Winter what is believed to have been the biggest and most representative gathering of the Bantu races in history assembled at Bloemfontein, with delegates from all over Cape Colony, as well as Rhodesia, Southwest Africa, Bechuanaland, Swaziland and Basutoland.

Under the guidance of Kadalie the African National Convention, as the conference was called, adopted resolutions demanding the extension of the franchise to all negroes, opposing any form of segregation, and calling for a conference between the Government and representatives of the convention.

It is evident that the white races have not yet mastered the African problem, and if they do succeed in wresting from the negro the continent's treasures, there will be eager hands outstretched when the spoils are divided.

STUDENT AUTOS WORRY COLLEGES

Academic World Torn by Controversy in Which Rubber-Tired Companions of Play Hours Receive Praise and Blame

THE automobile is doing very poorly at college. It flunks here and "busts out" there. It has been expelled from Penn State and from the University of Illinois. It is heavily conditioned at Yale, and is having a bad semester at Princeton. Faculties accuse it of truancy and vagrancy and of running about where the wine listeth. Student majorities turn against it, student minorities defend it. Almost everywhere in the academic world it is on trial.

When the automobile entered college in the long ago there was loud outcry against it. Kind-hearted people feared it would cause the pedestrian student to feel inferior and underprivileged. The objection can be smiled at now, for the reason that the most arrant of campus patricians prides himself on driving the saddest-looking car obtainable at the junk yard, a car that a plebeian with any pride at all would scorn to drive to a dog-fight. That pre-Volstead wail of alarmed democracy is not heard in the present clamor.

More serious charges confront the student-owned automobile today. They are made chiefly in residential colleges rather than in urban universities, such as Harvard, Columbia and Chicago, where most of the students dwell off campus. Dr. Christian Gauss, Dean of the College at Princeton, puts the first of the accusations in a sentence. "The automobile," he says, "is the enemy of residence."

Above any other agency, Dean Gauss explains, the car tends to counteract the idea around which the residential colleges are built. They aim to surround the student with the academic atmosphere, as at Oxford and Cambridge, and to keep him in it, at work and at play, absorbing its influence outside of the classroom as well as within, for four years. The idea has a hard time of it when the automobile waits at the campus gate to carry the student far beyond the silvery sound of the chapel bell.

A Barrel of Trouble.

If that were all, the car might be forgiven; for youth must rove, must look beyond the bend of the College High Street, must investigate whatever may lie behind the residential hedge; and the college doesn't operate sight-seeing buses. But the romping rubber-tired companion of the student's play hours often leads him into a peck, if not a barrel, of trouble, and the trouble, besides harming him, invariably comes back on the college.

Student crashes, student casualties—the day's news would hardly be complete without them. Road accidents are probably no commoner among students than among young people of any other class; but the fact that the principals are collegians is always good for a headline that makes the college look very much like a party to the crime.

"Rutgers Men Run Down Traffic Officer," or, "Cornell Students Jailed for Speeding"—it is a bit rough on good old Rutgers and on virtuous old Cornell. It advertises them as hotbeds of recklessness and unrestraint and causes their venerable graduates to grieve no end.

But a man who suffers more than these graduates is the college officer who looks after student conduct and student welfare. He and the passenger in the ambulance bear the brunt of the accident.

Student Self-Government.

In the world at large it would be the boy's parents who heard from the police, the doctors, the hospital, the coroner, the undertaker, the relatives and the lawyers of the student's victim, the insurance companies, the garage men and the Commissioner of Motor Vehicles. In the college world it is the Dean whose telephone bell rings, whose door is assailed in the small hours of night, whose ears listen to stories of pain and loss, and whose task it becomes to straighten out, as well as he can, the tragic tangle that flaming youth has made. And a man who acts in place of parent for several hundred flaming youths begins, after a few years, to feel a little down on the notion that a student needs an automobile to any great extent.

The outright prohibiting of motor cars would not jibe, however, with the modern idea of student self-government. Faculties of liberal institutions of learning go on the principle that reforms, if they are to stick, must arise from the campus rather than descend from the college office. Student sentiment must be respected.

Thus at Amherst two years ago the Faculty consulted with a student committee before making so bold as to forbid cars to under-class men. At Princeton last year, after six fatalities had roused campus opinion to the need of putting on the brakes, the students themselves took the initiative.

Scholarships and Motors.

By student ordinance at the New Jersey university freshmen are now barred from using cars, and sophomores may use cars only by special permission on such occasions as the visits of parents, and then for but three days. Car ownership is restricted to upper-class men whose parents formally consent and whose applications the college authorities approve. These rules have reduced the proportion of drivers among the students to about one in ten.

The Princeton trustees also have taken a hand. A few years ago it was hard to reach a recitation hall for the swarms of cars parked around it. As custodians of the college property, the trustees could regulate that nuisance, hence automobiles are scarce now under the elms, and the campus has regained its monastic quiet and its truly rural look of old.

Then, just the other day, the college received a parental letter asking permission for a student to possess and drive a car. A certain supersumptuous make of car was specified. Authority paused in deep thought. Wasn't that particular student the beneficiary of a scholarship? Why should he maintain a vehicle of vast voluptuousness when he was taking tuition money from the poor and needy university treasury?

Inquiry disclosed that no fewer than eighteen men on scholarships were bloated motorists. With vigor the edict went forth that car privileges were not for such.

Self-Imposed Discipline.

"The college man today submits to nothing that he has not questioned first," we are told. "Docility may have done for his father and his uncles, but none of it for him. He won't be disciplined like a schoolboy, though he will discipline himself like a Spartan. Educators who meet this sudden new freedom daily and have to deal with it deny the popular notion that 'youth has ever been thus.' They know better. Between 1896 and 1926 there is a mile of difference.

"Prosperity, with its quick wealth, its ease and its distractions, has created a new youth problem, and parents who are unable or unwilling to cope with the problem in the home send it along to the college. And then we hear"—the Faculty moralist smiles sadly—"that we are paternalistic. The truth is that we abhor paternalism as much as the student does. At the same time we find, as a rule, that boys who have known it least and need it most cry loudest against it."

Many fond parents, from all that can be gathered, support the student in this adult attitude when the automobile is in question. They can't see why Johnny, after an exhausting day over his books, should be deprived of the innocent pleasure of a spin in the fresh country air.

Arguing for Johnny.

Johnny is a good driver, a much safer driver than his father, in fact, because he is so quick and strong. The only really serious accident he ever had was that time in prep school when he struck the baby carriage; and everybody knows it was the nurse's fault.

And if poor Charles and Rupert weren't able to get home from Springfield before midnight and so were dropped by the stuffy old Faculty, was it their fault that they ran out of gas at Meriden, miles from a garage? Just because they had bad luck, must Johnny do without a convenience that he has had at home ever since he was 12?

So Johnny gets his plaything and the Dean's furrowed brow gets a new wrinkle. The anxiety of fond parents over the happiness of their sons helps to explain why college administrators are slow to legislate against the inalienable right of the free-born American to tear around the country in a flivver, and why they endure the collegiate car in pained silence.

"We advise parents against letting their sons have cars," a Faculty man reports. "Most parents agree with us. But there are indulgent fathers and mothers who have forgotten how to say no—assuming that they have ever known how. They won't make the decision; they put it up to us.

"We know that few students seriously intent on education ask for cars, and that no student needs a car, unless he is crippled, or uses it in earning his way. We know from our records that fully half of our discipline cases occur among the comparatively small group of men who own cars. We can't blame the car for all the delinquencies, of course; but we do know that possession of a car tends to absence and failure. This, however, is a free country, the college believes in student responsibility, and there we are."

The Gravest Indictment.

It remained for a professor who has seen two generations pass through his classroom to state the gravest indictment against the student automobile.

"The age of the post road, the roadhouse and the highwayman has returned in the world," he said. "All that it once meant in the way of evil is here to prey on us again, multiplied many times by modern invention.

"Lawless resorts line the highways. We know of a dozen within a half-hour's run of the campus. Out in the country beyond municipal surveillance they flourish. They shelter the fugitives criminal, the bandit, the bootlegger, the hijacker, and they attract vicious women.

"Such establishments bring the worst of evils very near to the college, and often the student-owned automobile completes the contact. We have lost too many boys in those places. Two or three last year came close, in fact, to being lost to their parents as well as to us, for 'parties' in such surroundings so easily end in violence. We know what it is to bring young fellows robbed and half dead from those dens."

But the gray-haired mentor of youth was far from feeling pessimistic.

"In every college, I suppose," he said, "there will always be a foolhardy and irresponsible 5 per cent. of students who will find their way into trouble, no matter where they were. It is our pride that 95 per cent. of our men and, I believe, of all college men are a decent lot through choice. It is the 5 per cent. who give us most of our worries."

ONE FLAG FOR EUROPE IS UNFURLED AT VIENNA

Count Coudenhove-Kalergi Brings Men of Many Nations Together to Discuss Union—Movement Has Spread Rapidly in the Last Three Years

By DR. FRANCIS SNOW.

THE recent international bankers' manifesto which called for the breaking down of Europe's international customs barriers and which aroused sensational interest on both sides of the Atlantic, was a logical climax of the growth of the Pan-Europe idea in Europe. It is noteworthy that it followed so soon after the opening of the Pan-European Union Congress in Vienna on Oct. 3. This was an event that crowned the labors of Count Richard N. Coudenhove-Kalergi. Perhaps it has significance that this pioneer in the grandiose project of shaping out of Europe's racial hatreds and international distrusts a United States of Europe has 50 per cent. Oriental blood. It should not be forgotten that the first proposal to establish a World Court devoted to the maintenance of international peace came from a former Czar of Russia, a semi-Oriental land in race psychology.

Before an audience of fully 2,000 people and in the presence of a number of Europe's distinguished men—Paul Loebe, President of the German Reichstag; ex-Chancellor Seipel of Austria; ex-Minister George de Lukacs of Hungary; ex-Minister Nikola Politis of Greece (the acting Chairman); Alexander Kerensky; Herr Wirth, the former German Chancellor, and representatives from all the nations of Europe and both North and South America—the banner of the future United States of Europe was unfurled—a flaming cross against a golden sun on a blue field: the cross of the Crusader; the sun of hope; azure symbolizing poor humanity's almost hopeless aspiration alle stelle.

The proceedings of the congress have been reported in both the European and the American press. But the movement of which the congress may be said to be the first culmination is still imperfectly known. Cynics on both sides of the Atlantic have scoffed, and still scoff, at Coudenhove-Kalergi; but the man's personality and his dominating idea have made marked progress within the past two years.

First, the factor of heredity. Richard de Coudenhove-Kalergi is the son of a distinguished Austrian diplomat, Orientalist and philosopher, master of seventeen languages; and of a Japanese mother. The father, like most large-scale linguists, was obsessed by the dream of finding a solution for the world problem of races and nationalities, but his premature death brought surcease to his dreamings. His son was born in 1894 in the ancestral castle in Bohemia. His early youth was inspired by his father's international idealism, which his mother shared. It was an atmosphere of "intellectual chivalry." At the age of 17 he wrote a treatise on a problem of moral philosophy. This work he presented a few years later as a doctor's thesis at the University of Vienna. Already, like his father before him, he had begun his own dreaming—in his case, the question of "ennoblement," viz., the creation of superior personalities within a democracy. Later he became Professor at the University of Vienna. His courses drew hundreds of students, attracted by his fine and subtle physiognomy and his impassioned eloquence.

Movement Started in 1923.

Briefly, the history of the movement which has made him famous, is as follows:

The Pan-European project arose in the Autumn of 1923 with the publication of Coudenhove-Kalergi's sensational book, "Pan-Europe." Soon afterward the Pan-European Union was founded and the program of the movement was publicly discussed. During the first few months the idea was generally criticised throughout Europe as Utopian; but this attitude soon changed as the organization established contact with the leaders of European politics. In the Summer of 1924, Count Coudenhove-Kalergi, on behalf of the Pan-Enropean Union, addressed an open letter to the newly elected French Chamber. Three months later (October, 1924) Edouard Herriot, then French Premier, in a lengthy address at the Sorbonne, came out openly for the project of a United States of Europe. Dr. Stresemann, German Foreign Minister, greeted this enggestion favorably. At the Twenty-third World Peace Congress in Berlin discussion of the Pan-European project was the central point of the debate.

The movement spread with great rapidity. Herriot, in a speech on Jan. 29, 1925, amid wild applause in the French Chamber, declared that Far East problems would demand all Europe's combined cooperation to solve, adding: "It is my greatest wish to see the day come when the United States of Europe will become a reality. * * * There are nations that must become reconciled, for their cooperation is indispensable."

Since that memorable speech the Pan-European ideal has become a centre of European political discussion, finding both champions and depreciators, finding also doubters, who cannot see either England or Russia entering into any such combination of federated States. In traveling through Central Europe this last Summer, the writer found the subject widely discussed, especially in Austria and Hungary. In Italy mainly dynamic opposition was noticed, and this is understandable.

The movement, it can hardly be denied, is constantly gaining weight and importance. Many distinguished political leaders have come out openly for "Pan-Europe" in public speeches, interviews or in written articles—such men as Briand, Painlevé, Jouvenel, Loucheur, Thomas, Caillaux, Nitti, Marx, Loebe, Koch, Simons, Seipel, Renner, Dinghofer, Sforza, Scialoja, Skrzynski, Masaryk, Benes, Vandervelde.

In this chorus of eminent voices not all are agreed on details. Some prefer to stress the United States of Europe idea; others lay weight on the economic factors and would concentrate on a program symbolized in the title: "The European Customs Union."

Support of the Masses.

The European press has taken up the discussion and brought it to the masses. Not only Liberals and Social Democrats but also Nationalists and Conservatives have hailed the movement enthusiastically. The Social Democratic and the Democratic Parties of Germany have incorporated it as a plank in their political platform. The Interparliamentary Union in the Autumn of 1925 voted to include it in its program. Many organizations have accepted it. A considerable Pan-European literature has arisen; new magazines and new societies have been founded to work for the success of the new movement.

The concrete aims of the union, the headquarters of which are in Vienna, with autonomous branches in Germany, Czechoslovakia, Austria and Hungary and other branches in France, Belgium, Holland, Switzerland, Denmark, Finland, Latvia, Estonia, Bulgaria and the United States, are summarized as follows:

1. The Pan-European movement is the mass movement, over and above all parties, toward European union.

2. The Pan-European Union aims to become a sister organization to the Pan American Union.

3. The aim of the Pan-European movement is the union of all European States, which are willing and able to take this step, into a politico-economic confederation of nations based on justice and peace.

4. The program of the Pan-European movement, from the standpoint of world politics, is: Friendly cooperation with the League of Nations, as well as with other continents representing political units.

5. The Pan-European Union rejects all intervention in questions of internal politics.

Setting aside all mystic-metaphysical speculations indulged in by the movement's founder, the central thesis is briefly as follows: Europe must develop its highly individualistic genius under conditions of complete freedom. "Europe's history is a chain of wars of liberation." But the offset to this extreme individuality and love of freedom has been anarchy, estracism and self-destruction. The Gauls, Germans, Slavs, Italians and Greeks have been the victims of the misdirected and undisciplined will toward freedom, degenerating into oppression and attacks on the liberty of others. Hence came all the wars that have devastated Europe, including the World War. The last fratricidal war of Europe was the last chapter of this thousand years of history of war.

Europe on the Defensive.

But that history has reached its logical culmination and cannot continue or Europe will be destroyed. Europe is no longer protected by seas, vast plains and vast distances. It is exposed to perils, from America on the west, from Asia on the east. America is now stronger than Europe; tomorrow Asia may be stronger. Great Britain is drawn to America by blood and by the power of money. Russia is similarly attracted by Asia. This transformation of the world into east and west has suddenly placed Europe on the defensive. It is no longer a question of increase of power; it is a question of Europe's very life and freedom which can be saved only through unity. Facing this world situation, every fratricidal war is high treason and suicide. Union or self-destruction—that is the only alternative.

The remedy? First, the creation of a European customs union, which shall save Europe by destroying economic rivalries. Economic authorities stamp this project with the seal of their approval. Second, the creation of a general European political confederation. Political leaders, realizing the omens of the new world situation—the shrinking of distance and the relative diminishment of Europe by the enormous extension of scientific progress, the manifest dangers of a continuation of mutual suspicions and distrusts, marked by customs barriers and international feuds—have taken the Pan-European movement seriously. Both France and Belgium were officially represented at the Vienna congress. The movement has today 20,000 adherents.

Count Coudenhove-Kalergi.

Triumphant Vindication.

To Coudenhove-Kalergi the mere holding of that congress was a triumphant vindication of the doctrine of European union which he has been preaching since 1923; also a vindication of his negative attitude toward the achievements of the League of Nations, for whose continuance he utters, however, pious optatives, though cherishing the hope that it will embody within itself "a Pan-European section."

He sees little hope that England, because of her empire problems, will enter Pan-Europe as a regular member, though he hopes and believes that her final decision will not split the movement toward European peace, which England, as much, if not more than, any other European power, ardently desires. Russia, like England, must make her own decision. In Russia and Asia he sees an ever-increasing de-Europeanization, viz., emancipation from the Occidental modes of political thought and policy and even active hostility to them—a hostility which Russia indefatigably foments. In America he notes the hostility of the United States Government to the League of Nations. The League, he believes, has virtually failed in its main purpose—the ending of war and disarmament—while the finger of the Weltgeist inexorably points the way toward Pan-Europe.

At the Vienna congress Coudenhove-Kalergi admitted that the complete triumph of the movement might yet be long. He further declared that "a peaceful realization of Pan-Europe rests in the hands of less than 500 persons who govern Europe, and if the Pan-European idea does not succeed in convincing them it will succeed in overthrowing them."

OLD MAINE JUDGE DESCRIBES NEW ENGLAND 75 YEARS AGO

Ashley St. Clair Looks Back and Makes Comparisons of Past and Present

JUDGE ASHLEY ST. CLAIR of the Calais (Me.) Municipal Court has given a striking word picture of conditions that existed in Maine and other New England States seventy-five years ago—the year in which THE NEW YORK TIMES was founded.

"It was in 1851," he pointed out, "that the yacht America defeated the English yachts off the Isle of Wight, winning the cup that has remained here ever since. In 1851, less than twenty years after the invention of telegraphy, people still stood in awe of the telegraph and preferred to communicate by mail. Slow but sure, they regarded it. Then, too, telegraphing was expensive and money was scarce seventy-five years ago.

"Only skilled mechanics got $2 a day. An ordinary carpenter or machinist received $1.50; a common laborer 75 cents. A good farm hand could get as much as $10 or $12 a month and his board—an extra good man might get $15.

"There were few railroads seventy-five years ago. The usual mode of travel was by stage coach or other horse-drawn vehicle. The roads were seldom in decent condition and it was a good horse that conld go fifty miles a day and keep it up for any number of days.

Small Profit for the Farmer.

"Truck wagons were drawn by horses and oxen, and it was a common sight to see a farmer in town who had come ten or twelve miles with a load of produce drawn by oxen. Such a trip took an entire day and, if Fortune smiled, resulted in a profit of $2 to $3. Think of it—a man, a wagon and a yoke of oxen, working all day for $3! Still, money would buy more of the necessities of life seventy-five years ago than it will now.

"In 1851, tallow candles were used for illumination. There were illuminating fluids—most of them decidedly dangerous. Whale oil was used to some extent, and old whale-oil lamps are still occasionally to be found in our antique shops, or are exhibited as curiosities in old homes. Many people had molds and ran their own candles.

"Seventy-five years ago seed was sown, covered, cultivated by hand—the mower and the reaper were unknown. Grain was cut with a sickle and threshed with a flail. Hay was mowed with a hand scythe, raked and handled wholly by hand.

"In farming communities seventy-five years ago cooking was done in the fireplace and baking in a brick oven. Cook stoves were coming into use, but were scorned by a lot of housewives as food spoilers.

Spinning and Weaving.

"Ready-made clothing was unknown. Sewing and knitting were home duties. It was quite a number of years after 1851 before the sewing machine came into general use. Spinning and weaving were common accomplishments—the whirl of the spinning wheel and the thump-ump of the hand loom being familiar sounds.

"There were no daily papers and few weeklies in New England. The arrival of the Gospel Banner, the Maine Farmer or the Portland Transcript was an event. Families exchanged papers and hoarded them. Many an attic contained files of the weekly papers neatly tied together with twine. On rainy days these afforded uneasy young folk great consolation.

"Probably the boys and girls of today picture the world of 1851 as a pretty dull sort of a place—no trolley cars, no automobiles, no flying machines, no radio or moving pictures shows, but after all I think we laughed as often and as merrily as the young folk do nowadays. There was a lot of play mixed in with the hard work and the total of human happiness was fully as large as it is today.

SIDEWALK MOVIES NOW RIVAL THE OLD-FASHIONED PEEP-SHOW

THE penny peep-show has a rival in the new automatic sidewalk movie, which, recently introduced in New York, is already being put to a variety of uses.

Pedestrian traffic in Fulton Street was considerably blocked the other day at such a showing in a corner drug store window. All eyes were fixed on a two-foot screen upon which flickered a family dining-room scene. The daughter jumped up from her soup to gaze out of the window. Then followed, for the spectator, a glimpse of a pouring torrent, indicating a long, rainy evening. The family looked glum because it had to stay at home, until the father produced a package of books. Thereupon each member of the family made a selection and commenced to read.

The screen-gazer shared their thrills in a few selected scenes and finally saw the family reluctantly disperse to go to bed. The moral of the free show, of course, was "read more popular fiction," the window being full of books. But it mattered not to the gathered throng that this sidewalk movie was an advertising medium. It was a movie just the same.

The new variety of peep-show is an automatic projection machine, carrying its own screen in front of the machine and operating at the turn of an electric switch. Some of these machines continue to repeat their program for thirty-six hours without reloading. The roll of film is divided down the middle and only half is shown at a time. When the end of the roll is reached an automatic switch throws the other half of the film into view, showing the picture over again as the film is rewound. Other machines of the same type run off an eight-reel picture, which may be thrown on a screen of any size and require, after the loading, no manipulation save only the touch of a button.

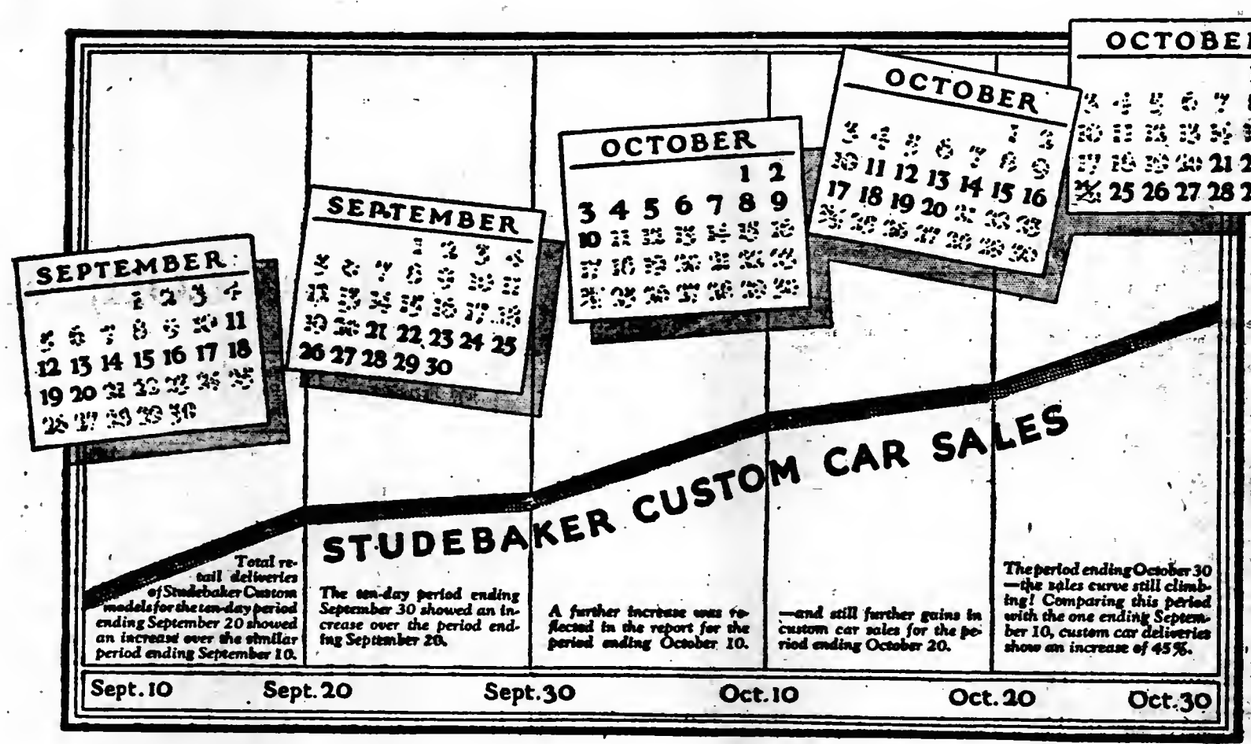
Complete units, carrying their own screens, are beginning to appear in front of moving-picture theatres to offer passers-by a sample of the theatre's current offering. Representatives of manufacturing interests plan to keep such machines in their offices and with the turn of a switch they reveal the story of their products without taking their visitors on long tramps through the shops. Traveling salesmen, it is said, will soon be using them to give demonstrations.

NOISE IS CENSORED BY TENANTS BELOW

THE tenants on the floor below are a greater influence in shaping the lives and the destinies of those on the floor above than they know. Their unexpressed approval of a quiet silence overhead and their often loudly expressed disapproval of noise have changed the form of apartment amusement in many ways.

There is the man who came from a small town, bringing his family with him. The children had enjoyed playing Spin the Plate, Stage Coach, Fruit Basket in their former home. But such games, when tried in the city apartment, brought immediate protest from the floor below. So at last the children were reduced to playing cards or sought entertainment at the movies.

Studebaker Custom Car Sales Keep Climbing



THE curve of motor car sales starts downward September 1, yet the actual retail sales of Studebaker Custom Cars have been steadily climbing upward since that date. Every ten-day period has shown steady and substantial gains. Sales of sedans—the most popular of all automobile body types—were three times as great for the period of September 1 to October 31 as during the same period in 1925!

Studebaker's significant sales record is the result of the distinct achievement of offering, for the first time, custom car luxury at sensible One-Profit prices!

You owe yourself a "look" at the new Studebaker Custom Cars—a ride, to test their superlative performance! Telephone, and a car will be brought to your door.

NEW SUBWAY HAS LONG STATIONS

Express Platforms of Eighth Avenue Line Are Expected to Speed Up Train Service And Lessen Congestion

THE express stations of the new subway now being built are expected to mark a great advance in such construction in point of convenience and efficiency. Profiting by experience in the old subways, the engineers have designed larger stations and new methods will be adopted to facilitate the movement of trains.

One of the most elaborate of the new express stations is being built at Eighth Avenue and Forty-second Street. It will extend from Fortieth to Forty-fourth Street, and be a fifth of a mile in length. The platforms will be very wide and will enable the new station to handle almost twice the number of passengers that can be accommodated in the Seventh Avenue section of the Times Square station.

The operating problem at the new Forty-second Street station is complicated by the fact that trains must be dispatched from these platforms for Washington Heights and for Queens via Fifty-third Street. The situation is much the same as that at Ninety-sixth Street, where two tracks branch off for the Lexington Avenue line. There will be two express and two local tracks as well as two tracks for the Fifty-third Street route.

One Line Under Another.

The two tracks of the Fifty-third Street line will approach Eighth Avenue at a lower level and turn into the avenue under the middle of the street. The two sets of tracks on Eighth Avenue meanwhile will be separated, the north and south bound tracks being carried beneath the curb line, allowing the Queens line to occupy the same level between them. For several blocks there will be six tracks abreast down Eighth Avenue, so that the Washington Heights and Queens trains will run independently of one another.

The six parallel tracks will be carried southward on the same level as far as Forty-eighth Street, where they pass above a trunk sewer. South of this point the two Queens tracks drop down to a level that will enable them to pass beneath the Washington Heights lines. The downtown station at Forty-second Street will be double decked, with the Queens tracks using the lower level. It will consist of a central platform with an express track on one side and a local track opposite.

A Simple Expedient.

The northbound traffic of both the Washington Heights and Queens lines will be handled, however, at the same station and on the same level. The problem confronted here, which is much the same as on the north bound station at Ninety-sixth Street, has been solved by a simple expedient. The northbound station is of the island type, with the local trains on the east side and the express tracks on the west side, as at Ninety-sixth Street. To the north of this station, however, there are three tracks, the one in the middle being the Queens line, which carries both the express and local trains bound for Fifty-third Street. Trains bound for Queens, express and local, switch to this middle track, while the northbound Washington Heights trains continue straight ahead on the same tracks without change of level.

By this arrangement no train crosses the tracks of any other train. There is an even flow of traffic from the station northward. All grade crossings are eliminated. The trains of both lines on stopping at the station load and unload while waiting to be dispatched; this saves times and enables a greater number of trains to pass the point in a given time, and collisions due to a cross-over are out of the question.

At the Ninety-sixth Street station there is constant delay because of its grade crossing.

The station extending from Forty to Forty-fourth Streets will be built tandem fashion similar to the elevated station at 125th Street. It will have two great platforms almost as wide as the Avenue above, each about two blocks in length. The lower platform will accommodate southbound and the upper one the northbound traffic. The southern platform for southbound traffic will be double-decked.

The new station is designed to reduce crowding. It will be possible to walk from Fortieth to Forty-fourth Streets without going from under cover. The long station will be furnished with booths and stores. The four blocks above it will in time be occupied by large buildings which will construct entrances at the lower levels, and an intricate and busy little city doubtless will develop about the station.

BIG POWER PROJECT IN INDIA WILL HARNESS PYKARA RIVER

INDIA, not to be outdone by Canada in conserving its natural water power resources, has recently startd construction on a hydroelectric plant at Pykara, the Summer seat of the Madras Government. Those who negotiated the plans, headed by Lord Goschen, the Governor of Madras, have convinced themselves of the extraordinary possibilities of the Pykara River, with its falls of 3,000 feet where it drops from the Nilgiri plateau into the plain. It is proposed to build a dam 164 feet high. This will give a water spread of nearly three miles, and, at full lake level, will impound about 4,000,000 cubic feet.

It is estimated that the power available will amount to 116,000,000 kilowatts each year. It is expected to sell this power to municipalities, railroads and industries.

The dam at Pykara is to be constructed to discharge the surplus, in addition to the normal discharge to be utilized for the development of power, through sluices in the body of the dam, which will be pierced. A weir, three miles down the river, will pick up the supply needed for the generation of power. The water will then be conveyed by a channel to a small reservoir formed by two earth dams built at each end of a hollow on one side of the road leading to Pykara Falls. This reservoir or forebay, as it is called, will have a storage capacity of 86,000,000 cubic feet. In the event of the main sluices being temporarily closed, this auxiliary reservoir will be able to keep the supply going without a break.

The Pykara project, it is expected, will be completed within two years. A smaller project, to be developed and eventually connected with it, the Moyar system, will take another year to complete. The plan for utilizing the Moyar River will result in only 10,000 kilowatts, obtained from using again the waters already used at Pykara. The water from the Pykara power house will be taken by a channel to be constructed for the purpose to another small river, then through a lower power house to be built on the banks of the Moyar River. The power generated here will be transmitted to the Pykara power station, so that in the end the two developments will form a single complete whole. The two projects together will cost the Government about 28,000,000 rupees.

SOIL GETS BOTH FOOD AND DRINK FROM RAIN, EXPERIMENTS PROVE

RECENTLY announced results of a seventeen-year experiment in Ottawa, Canada, reveal rain in the rôle of fertilizer, supplying food as well as drink to the soil. In that neighborhood the annual rainfall was found to do for the soil what it would take forty-four pounds of expensive nitrates imported from Chile to do.

The choice food that rainfall supplies is nitrogen and the air is its source. Normally air is four-fifths nitrogen; but plants surrounded by it might die for lack of this necessary nourishment, since they can use the gas only in chemical combination. The most common combination is free ammonia which, collected hy the atmosphere from a variety of sources, is washed out of it and into the soil by falling rain.

When plants and animals decompose, free ammonia is given off into the air. Lightning bolts, too, may affect the proper combination of nitrogen with hydrogen; ammonia is made according to a method similar to that employed in the laboratory by the electric arc process. A great deal of the ammonia in the air comes from smoke—the smoke of factories, homes or forest fires. Increased use of soft coal in recent years, according to Dr. Frank T. Shutt, of the Canadian Department of Agriculture in charge of the experimentation, may account for the increased amount of ammonia in the air. Analyses for one year showed a decided jump in the nitrogen content of rainfall, which was attributed to the building of new factories in the neighborhood.

TOMBS ADDS TO LONG RECORD OF BOLD PRISONER OUTBREAKS

a small hat and a greenish veil presented herself at the pass-out gate, showing her red ticket and weeping copiously into a handkerchief, like a wife who had just come from the cell of a condemned husband. The keepers at the gate sensed something a little odd about her; but she had the red ticket and they let her pass.

Five minutes later Maggie Jourdan also appeared at the gate, gave up her red ticket and went her way. But at 2 o'clock, when the bell sounded the exit of all visitors, Mrs. Allen appeared, fumbled madly through her purse and all her clothing and distractedly declared she had lost her red ticket. The ticket was not found, but when the keepers went up to the second tier they found Cell 40 barren, save for some drying lather and a little black hair that had been Sharkey's mustache.

Sharkey got safely to Ireland, where he died many years later. Mrs. Allen had to be released, but an investigation resulted in the dismissal of a few keepers and the indictment of Maggie Jourdan. Like the Countess of Nithisdale (Feb. 23, 1715), this girl had saved her man from death by smuggling to him a woman's clothing. No jury could ever be found to convict Maggie and she became a figure in balladry and story. Poems, songs, sketches and burlesques all celebrated her deed and, a thing not common in our fathers' day, a job on the stage was offered to her; but she modestly declined.

A decade of peace descended on the Tombs after the Sharkey affair, punctuated only by periodic flights of Mahony. In 1884, Bummers' Hall, the famous old building inside the Tombs walls, where vagrants and drunks were detained, was torn down to make room for two new wings, needed because the city had grown apace since 1838. In the north wing was the famous Murderers' Row, where, in the late '80s and the '90s, were housed Carlisle Harris, Dr. Buchanan, Dr. Kennedy, Martin Thorn, Roland Molineux and less celebrated prisoners, guilty and innocent.

Building of the New Jail.

In the middle '90s it became apparent that the old jail was no longer fit or adequate. So, in 1897, the construction of the present Renaissance Gothic castle was begun. The new jail was built while the old was still occupied parts of the latter being torn down as fast as new sections were finished. This slow and costly method caused various strikes, political scandals and investigations, the imprisonment of one of the principal contractors on a forgery conviction being one result. The completion of the new Tombs was held up until 1905. Now, at the end of twenty-one years of service, the State Prison Commission has already recommended that it be torn away and a much bigger jail built in its place, preferably on one of the East River Islands. The present Tombs was designed to house 300 prisoners, but it now has an average daily membership of between 700 and 800.

Escapes from the new Tombs have been frequent enough but sensational instances have been few. One of the most remarkable of all was the flight of that redoubtable jailbreaker, Reynolds Forsbrey, on Sept. 2, 1912. Forsbrey was awaiting trial for murder and was being constantly visited in the callers' room by his sweetheart, Mary Ryan, a Brooklyn girl. One night he was found trying to cut the bars of his cell with saws and a bottle of muriatic acid. He was taken out and locked up in the isolation cells on the ground floor. Here a guard was set to watch him all night and a trusty prisoner was placed in the cell with him to prevent any suicidal attempts. The guard was instructed to change every hour. But this prison keeper had been at a political dinner the night before and was suffering from lack of sleep. He dozed in his chair and the trusty also went blissfully to snoring.

Thereupon Forsbrey rose up, tilted his cot against the wall, reached a high ventilator, found the screws rusted away by time, and like Schrader fifty years before him, pulled the thing out. Forsbrey wriggled through the hole, dropped into a service shaft, groped his way to the carpenter shop, found a rusted bar, which he smashed with one blow from a scantling, dragged a long piece of wood into the yard, leaned it against the wall, clambered up and dropped into the street. He was found some months later in the Bronx, living in Fox Street with Mary Ryan. Later he escaped with her aid from Dannemora and from Auburn, but was quickly recaptured in each instance.

The Forsbrey escape caused an investigation which brought about a number of changes in the conduct of the jail, placing it, among other things, completely under the care of the Department of Charities and Correction.

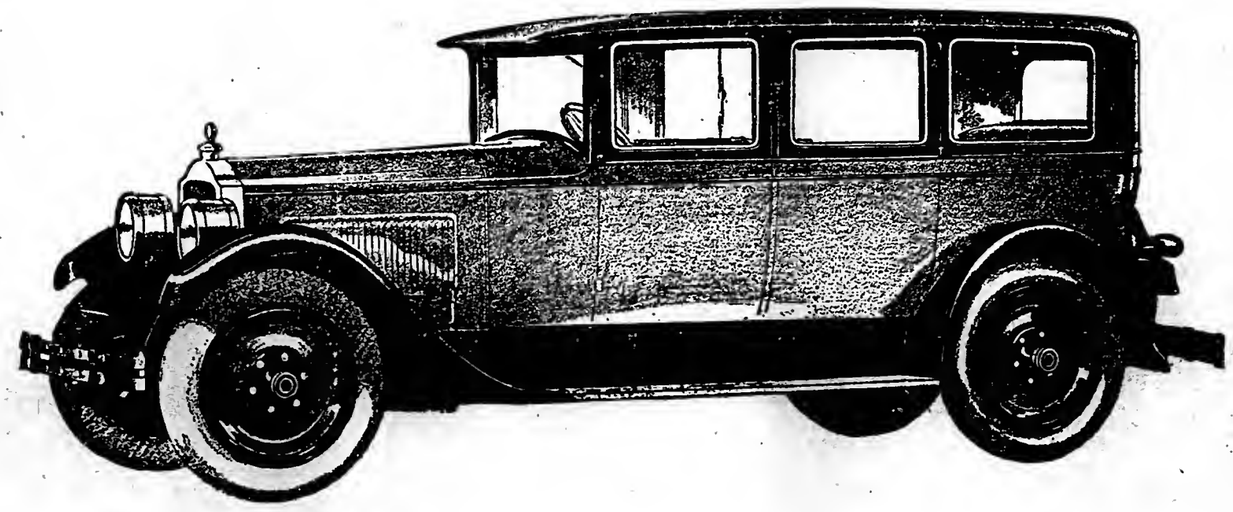
In 1918 Vincent Gaffney, a gangster who recently led a more or less bloody revolt in Sing Sing, made perhaps the last striking getaway from the Tombs. Gaffney got free in broad daylight, at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, by defying all the laws of physics and physiology. He had noticed, like Forsbrey and Schrader, that some screws were loose or rusty. This time it was a window in the kitchen, on the top tier, overlooking the women's prison. He saw his opportunity and notified gangster friends to be in Lafayette Street with a fast car.

At 4 o'clock on the afternoon of July 12, the cook left the kitchen for a trip to the Warden's office. Gaffney immediately removed the screws with the aid of a kitchen knife, swung himself out the window, hung by his hands and dropped nearly twenty feet to the roof of the women's prison. He ran across the roof, again hung by his hands and landed fifteen feet down on the top of the visitors' room. Another quick run and a twelve-foot drop took him to the roof of a low shed, from which he clambered upon the wall and dropped another twenty-odd feet to the street. A prisoner named Callahan who tried to follow Gaffney broke his ankle at the first drop and had to quit, but the gangster reached the street safely, ran to the waiting car, which was already on the move, and was rushed away to safety. He was not caught until months afterward, when the police picked him out of a New Jersey cabaret and sent him up the river for twenty years.

The workers in the various tall buildings surrounding the Tombs watched Gaffney make his succession of dizzy leaps and drops, just as they watched the gun fight between the three convicts and the police last week. Neither they nor the prison authorities could act quickly enough to stay the acrobatic Gaffney in his flight.

There have been no escapes since then to match these, but in the bit of wild Western deperado work translated to the heart of downtown New York, the prison experienced excitement more acute though perhaps less lasting than all the others.

The Packard Six seven-passenger sedan-limousine is ideally beautiful and distinguished. Here is the supreme combination of all that is fine in motor cars.



The Long-Lived Packard Six Has Doubled The Fine Car Market

PACKARD has made it possible for more than twice as many people to own really fine cars.

Packard has achieved this remarkable public benefit not by lowering standards and cutting prices but by raising standards—building far finer cars than it has ever been possible to build before—and through engineering improvements making these new and improved cars last twice as long in service.

So Packard owners need face no "used car problem". They are learning that they can themselves use all of the long mileage life Packard sells them—and do it comfortably and enjoyably in cars which never even look out of date, no matter how long they are continued in use.

For Packard has long protected its owners' interests. No radical changes in appearance are made from year to year. And when, as in recent months, improvements in motor design add greatly improved performance, a large measure of this increased power is made available to recent purchasers at low cost—in this instance by a new head quickly applied to the older motors.

Naturally Packard sales have tremendously increased. The finest cars Packard has ever built are today far lower in first cost, in cost per mile of operation, and in maintenance cost than any Packard ever was before.

If you really desire Packard ownership but feel you cannot afford so fine a car, come in and see us before buying a compromise. We can prove to you that you can afford to own and drive the car you want.

The Packard Six five-passenger sedan is but $2781.00 delivered at your door. And the Packard payment plan makes purchase surprisingly easy. May we explain it to you?

FORD'S AIR LINERS RUN LIKE SCHEDULED TRAINS

All-Metal Planes Carrying Passengers and Freight Are in Service on Four Routes From Detroit—Safety Problem Called Virtually Solved—Rapid Development Heralded

By H. I. BROCK.

WHILE Washington, with three deputy Air Ministers on the job in three Cabinet departments, is plotting air routes, installing lights for night flying of the mails, and drawing up a code of rules for the security of air navigation, it is announced from a British source that Germany has already made safe air-travel a part of the routine of transport in Europe—and captured a long lead in that continent's development of commercial aviation. On the heels of that announcement comes another. The American Railway Express has contracted for an aerial express service which, in the Spring, will connect New York, Chicago and Dallas, Texas.

Thus America follows, instead of leading. Yet America is not quite so far behind as might appear. For at one place, at least, in the United States air transport—not meaning mere letter-carrying—is as much a present fact of commercial routine as it is in Germany. At the Ford airport at Dearborn, Mich., twelve miles from Detroit, aircraft arrive and depart on schedule, like railway trains, six days in the week, and these aircraft carry in the most businesslike fashion freight, mails and passengers.

Eighteen Months' Progress.

Though it is only some eighteen months since the first metal airplane was built at the Ford plant, all these arriving and departing planes are Ford-built metal monoplanes of shining duralumin, the smallest of them with a carrying capacity of eight passengers—or the equivalent in goods. The regular schedules upon which they run connect Detroit with Chicago, Cleveland, Buffalo and Grand Rapids. The first three are freight and mail lines, the last carries passengers.

About a year ago Henry Ford sized up the situation thus: "Flying," he said, "is now 90 per cent. man and 10 per cent. machine. Our undertaking is to make it 90 per cent. machine and 10 per cent. man." Today, standing at the Ford airport, with the great cantilever hangar serving the purpose of a locomotive roundhouse, the vast building next to it, which is machine shop and airplane factory, the mooring mast to which the Los Angeles recently tied up, the airplanes arriving and departing or waiting with whirling propellers on the concrete starting platform—the impression is that a long step has been taken toward the 90 per cent. machine stage.

Past Experimental Stage.

A two-and-a-half-ton solid metal ship that rises easily from the ground and goes off through the air straight toward its destination—and arrives there on time day after day and week after week—is certainly not a machine of 10 per cent. performance. And "on schedule" means just that. An official glances at his watch. He says, "The Chicago mail is due to start in five minutes." You look down the platform. There stands the plane with pilot aboard. A man goes by with mail bags. There is a roar of engines and the plane is off down the field. A minute more and its nose is in the wind and it is up and away.

Again the official looks at his watch. "In two minutes," he says, "you ought to see the Grand Rapids plane over there." He points toward the sky above the main Ford office building. In less than two minutes you do see the plane—a mere speck in the blue. Then you hear the hum of the engine, the great shining thing comes swinging down, lands and taxies up to the platform. The gangplank is run out and the passengers are discharged.

So much for the impression upon the mere bystander. Now look over the ships in the roundhouse or those being built in the shops with Ford's chief engineer—a man of ripe years and solid, practical engineering experience, chief engineer of the Ford motor factories, of the Ford shipyards, of the Ford mines, of the Ford railway, of all the Ford structures and power plants. William Benson Mayo is that man. Mayo says, "We already have a safe ship." He is convinced that the metal monoplane of sixty to seventy foot wing spread which Ford is manufacturing belongs to the same class of practical utilities as the motor boat and the automobile, and that it is even more dependable than was either automobile or motor boat in stages relatively as early in their development.

Quantity Production.

Mayo's confidence (and Ford's confidence) in the type is shown by the fact that the Stout metal monoplane with three motors has gone into quantity production at the Ford factory. One of these planes is flying in the freight service. One is in the roundhouse awaiting delivery to an outside air line. Two are in various stages of completion in the shop. Two a week are to be turned out hereafter. Something like twenty are already on order for use on air lines all over the country.

Primarily the Fords are air craft manufacturers, as they are automobile manufacturers; but as pioneer aircraft manufacturers it has been their first business to demonstrate the commercial practicality of aircraft on their own air lines. The development of these lines has engaged so much of the best energies of Ford's plant and of his best men that there is no telling how much the air transport of the immmediate future will be Ford-controlled.

To be sure, the Ford mechanical accomplishment goes little, if any, beyond what has been done in Germany, where the metal plane had its origin. But in spite of all the foreign progress and all the persistent flying since the war by army, navy and private enterprise, it took the entry of the Fords into the business of building and using airplanes to win the recognition of air transport by the Government and engage even the present half-hearted support of the American public. For, so far, half-hearted support is all that exists. Therefore it is vitally important to take stock of what the Fords have actually done since they took hold of and began to make go something of which the whole country—in spite of its high imagination and mechanical genius—had seemed to be desperately afraid.

Rapid Development.

Even the Fords began cautiously. The first Ford airplane was officially and meticulously credited to the Stout Metal Airplane Company as builders. But within four months the Stout Company and William B. Stout himself, inventor and designer of the plane, had been absorbed into the Ford concern. It was when that transfer took place that Henry Ford announced that his plant was committed to the demonstration of the practicality of aircraft.

Let us see what has happened since that date:

Regularly since April 1925, there has been operated between Chicago and the Ford airport at Dearborn an airplane service carrying freight and mails for the Ford Company. This service has been run on railway schedule, with locomotive engineer discipline for the pilots and mechanics, and with amazing freedom from even minor accidents.

The service began with one all-metal Stout airplane of the one-motor type which is now being superseded by the three-motor type. This original plane is in all essentials identical with the all-metal machine shown last year in New York. It is a monoplane, of about sixty-foot wing spread, weighing a little more than 5,000 pounds with body and wings built of duralumin truss-work like a bridge, and both wings and body covered with thin sheets of corrugated duralumin.

Duralumin, it may be explained, is an aluminum copper alloy almost as light as paper and quite as strong as steel. When it is polished—as is done to make it doubly weather proof—it shines like silver. Driven by a 400-horsepower Liberty motor, the ship carries 140 gallons of gasoline in tanks in the wings, enough for four hours of flying. It has cabin room for eight passengers when freight is not being carried. The time to Chicago is two and a half hours. Later, other planes were added, including a three-motor plane.

Regularly since July, 1925, a like Ford air service for freight and mail has been operated to Cleveland with the same type of ship. There have been no accidents and infrequent delays. The time is one and a quarter hours. With the opening of the new Buffalo airport is added to these lines a third with the same flying time as that to Chicago.

Successful Service.

These air routes are operated by the Ford company and carry no passengers. They are experimental in that they are used to test and demonstrate the planes, but they have demonstrated likewise their utility in expediting shipments of motor parts and they have saved the company thousands of dollars in postage alone. One of the planes in the Chicago service has a record of 1,000 hours in the air, others have as much as 600 hours to their credit. They are as good as new, better, according to the men who fly them, most of them picked army pilots.

Regularly since July 31 of this year has been operated by the Stout Air Services, an independent company of which William B. Stout retains control, the Detroit-Grand Rapids air line. This is a service for passengers between the Ford airport at Dearborn and the municipal airport at Grand Rapids, a distance of approximately 150 miles. It, too, is run on schedule like a railway and with railway discipline for the crews. The flying stock for the present consists of one all-metal Ford-built Stout monoplane of the type already described. Two comfortable compartments carry eight passengers, the inside is padded to reduce the noise (conversation is hardly more difficult than in a Pullman car with the windows open) and heating apparatus is provided, so that Winter flying involves no hardship. The crew consists of a pilot and a mechanic who, like the pilot, is a trained operator and can fly and land the ship, which has double controls.

A few minutes before 9 o'clock every morning except Saturday and Sunday the Grand Rapids plane rolls up in front of the big service hangar on the Ford airport; a motor car arrives from Detroit bringing the passengers; a gangplank is run up to the cabin door; the passengers, after being weighed in, troop aboard just as they would over the gangplank of an ocean liner. Then the doors are closed and the already-whirling propeller speeds up. At 9 o'clock sharp the ship taxies across the field, points into the wind and takes off. Once up, it swings around into its course and flies steadily across the farm country and over the towns of Michigan. The railway and the State highway serve as landmarks. Thus the plane follows an almost literal airline to the Grand Rapids airport and taxies across to the concrete disembarking platform. Once more the gangplank is run up, and the passengers descend after one hour and three-quarters or less in the air.

A Municipal Air Port.

The Grand Rapids municipal airport has a station more like a clubhouse than most railway stations, and there is a motor waiting to whisk passengers into town. In fine weather the journey is accomplished in considerably more comfort than it would be in a parlor car. In rainy or stormy weather the passenger by airplane is apt to be aware that he is not on terra firma—that he is navigating an ocean—but, if the air is an ocean, ocean travel is no novelty in this age.

The point to make is that in the three and a half months since the service was begun, rain or shine, storm or calm, the plane has left the Ford airport on schedule and arrived practically on schedule. The return journey, starting at 2:30, Central Time, and arriving at the Ford airport at 5:15, Eastern Time, has been accomplished with regularity.

Flying in Comfort.

No accidents of any moment have occurred, not a trip has been missed, not a soul hurt or even inconvenienced beyond a little air sickness in rough weather—this only in the case of a few.

The Detroit-Grand Rapids Airline is the first operating unit of what is to be called the Detroit, St. Paul and Western Airline. By next Spring it is proposed to extend the service to the Twin Cities of Minnesota. The distance of 600 miles covered allows the saving of so much time over the railway schedules that this one air link will shorten the time from Seattle to New York by a business day. The thing that will make this service possible—involving as it does a seventy-mile jump across Lake Michigan—is the 3-motored plane which represents the evolution of the original Stout-Ford monoplane in the period since Ford production began.

Chief Engineer Mayo has been quoted as asserting this 3-motored metal airplane is safe and dependable. But he points out that thinking of things as safe and dependable is very much a matter of habit and custom.

He says, for instance, that he personally has never ceased to marvel that a fast railway train stays on the track, with nothing but a shallow flange on the wheels to keep it there. As a matter of cold fact, the only thing that keeps the rear wheels of a big modern locomotive on the track at high speed is the drip from an oil can on the flange—which, ungreased, would climb the rail.

Most of us ride confidently on fast express trains. Mayo, who is an engineer of railways among other things, rides also. But he rides with a knowledge of the narrow margin of safety—a knowledge which most of us are spared. Whereas in the air we are acutely conscious of all the obvious sources of danger, and suspicious of many that do not exist.

Additional Safety.

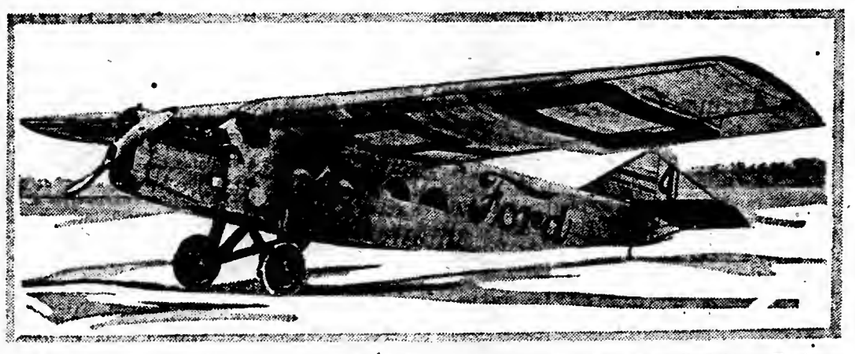
The factor of additional safety in the three-motored plane is, of course, the additional pair of motors. If one fails the plane can still fly, with reduced efficiency. If two fail it still has the advantage at normal flying heights of something like fifteen to twenty-five miles radius of gradual descent, making it so much easier to pick out a good emergency landing field.

However, the failure of a perfected flying motor is a thing that ought not to happen any oftener than the failure of an automobile motor happens now—if it is a good motor properly taken care of.

The Liberty engine (used in the single-motor Ford ship) is a dependable flying motor. Ford experience has shown that it is good for a hundred hours between overhaulings. The Wright radial motor is also a good flying motor. The same experience allows it 200 hours out of the shop. It is an air-cooled motor, and therefore lighter and subject to fewer mishaps. Mayo says it is really as absurd to use a water-cooled motor for aircraft as it would be to use an air-cooled motor for water craft. The Ford laboratory is working on an engine which is expected to show materially increased efficiency. But the ultimate motor for air work will be air cooled—on that point the Ford engineer is clear.

For the present, the main enterprise is the air transport, the freight and passenger carrying plane, a combination of motor truck and motor bus in the air. In practice the Wright radial motors do very well as motive power of the bigger Ford bus or air truck. Three of these motors, of 200 horsepower each, drive the plane. One is on the nose, one is swung beneath a wing on each side in such fashion that the three propellers do not overlap and thus create a strain which very much reduces the propeller's useful life. The wings and body are built (as in the earlier type) of duralumin—the frame a bridge-like structure and both wings and body sheathed with sheets of duralumin, corrugated for greater strength and rigidity.

SINGLE-MOTORED FORD PASSENGER PLANE



This Ship Is Used on the Detroit-Grand Rapids Airline and Is Driven by a 400-H. P. Liberty Engine.

This account deals particularly with the Ford accomplishments, because of what they signify to the popular mind. Obviously something definite in the way of progress has been made in a year and a half, and the program of production of transport aircraft ahead is evidence of a firm belief in the near future of widely extended commercial aviation. It is evidence, too, of the confidence of the Ford people in the type of aircraft which they are building and indicates that they believe that the basic design of dependable heavier-than-air flying machine has been discovered.

It was not until 1924 that Stout's first plane of the current pattern was built, and it was this plane which won for him the backing of the Fords. Eventually the plane involved the big investment of American capital in the means of transportation which will be typical of the era into which we are entering in this second quarter of the twentieth century. So much the Ford experts assume.

If confirmation of that assumption were needed it would seem to be contained in the German air record of the last five months to which the world's attention was so sharply called by Sir Robert Donald. With six centres—Berlin, Cologne, Munich, Hanover, Hamburg and Stuttgart—operating as regularly as the Ford airport at Detroit, they have in that five months flown 2,500,000 miles and carried 25,000 passengers practically without accident.

RUSSIAN TOWNS AND DISTRICTS NOW HAVE BOLSHEVIST NAMES

THE world is familiar with the changing of the name of Petrograd to Leningrad, thus discarding the founder of modern Russia in favor of the founder of Bolshevism; but it is perhaps not aware of the extent to which, in like fashion, the nomenclature of Russian geography has been transformed. Thus Alexandropol in Armenia, Kolchugina in Siberia, Prishib in Tsaritsin and Taldom in the Government of Moscow have all been changed to Leninsk. Especially have names reminiscent of former sovereigns of Russia been abolished, replaced by those suggestive of leaders of the Soviet régime.

Names of statesmen and soldiers of the old régime have also fallen out of favor. Thus Skobelyef is changed to Fergana and Orloff to Chalturin. Designations conveying any reminder of the Czarist period have given place to others of Bolshevist suggestion. Thus Velyiko Knasheskaya or "Grand Duke City" has become Proletarskaya or "Proletariat City" and Tsarskoye Selo, or "Czar's Village," has become Detskoye Selo, or "Children's Village."

Both the Government and the town of Tsaritsyn are now called Stalingrad, after the Soviet leader. Special animosity has been shown toward names having any religious significance. The Scriptural name Sarepta has been changed to Krasnoarmeysk; Vsechvyalski, or "All Saints Place" to Uritskyi. The cloister town of Monastyrskoye has become Turnichansk.

SPY FEVER STILL TROUBLES EUROPE

Frequent Arrests Show That the Powers Are Keen to Learn Secrets of Their Neighbors' Military Preparations

By JOHN CARTER

EIGHT years after the armistice Europe still has the malady known as "spy fever." This fever centers around the two greatest military powers on the Continent, France and Russia, but is confined to no one nation. In fact, of the so-called great powers, the United States is the only nation exempt from the dread of spies.

The last few days of October saw another spy alarm in France, when Maurice Philibert Charton, an employe of the Paris-Lyons Railway, was arrested on the Cologne Express with a valise full of secret documents relating to the mobilization plans of the French army. It was stated that Charton, who is married, had become entangled with a German woman in the Ruhr and had been won over by her to inform the German authorities as to French plans. On his arrest Charton asserted that he had pretended to comply with the Germans in order to entrap them. His case has not yet come to trial.

The Charton case is the third sensational spy episode in France within a year. Early in December of 1925 there was the arrest of a woman and three British subjects for attempting to obtain French aviation secrets. Last July it was learned that Desiré David, a former officer of the French army, had fled to Germany and had joined the German spy service, after a romance which began in a Düsseldorf hospital.

The aviation case was one of the most prickly subjects handled by the French authorities. France has an air force of over 5,500 planes, as opposed to Great Britain's 1,000-odd fighting machines. Moreover, with the exception of some squadrons in Syria and Morocco, this French force is concentrated in France, where it can threaten England, while the British forces are not only scattered in Palestine, Transjordania, Egypt and Iraq, but those concentrated for home defense are divided between the army and navy. French aviation plans are, therefore, of considerable interest to the British authorities.

Three British Subjects Sentenced.

A French girl, Marthe Moreuil, confessed to the French Secret Service that the Paris radio business run by William Fischer, a naturalized British subject, was a blind for covering British espionage. Two Paris residents, John H. Leather and Ernest Oliver Philippe, both British subjects, and one a former British intelligence officer, were also involved, and as the case developed Audre Le Febvre, a dancer known as "Madame Foxtrot," entered the situation. In May the three men were condemned to imprisonment and fines, while the girl was let off with a light sentence. The British intimated that the whole thing was revenge for the action of the British Secret Service in running five French spies out of Great Britain a short time previously.

The David incident developed from an acquaintanceship with a German spy made through Sister Helena, a nurse in the hospital at Düsseldorf. David wrote to a woman, Mathilde Tardieu, in Paris, and asked her to get confidential information from the artillery officers at the Versailles garrison. Mathilde's questions aroused suspicion and David, who had served with distinction in the French Army during the war, fled to Germany in time to escape arrest.

Just to round out the situation, last April the French Secret Service arrested two Frenchmen at Nice. They were accused of spying out the naval bases at Marseilles and Toulon, and it was intimated that they were acting in the interest of the Italian Ministry of Marine.

The French, on their part, have not been idle. A year ago the court at Leipsic imposed a sentence of ten years' imprisonment on a German noncommissioned officer named Koehler, who was accused of selling military secrets to the French in 1922-24. And last Spring it was reported that three pretty French girls had been used by the French Secret Service to acquire naval information concerning the United States from the officers of the U. S. S. Pittsburgh, our flagship in European waters.

Agents of the Red International.

The other area of Europe where the spy mania is at its height is throughout the Baltic States and in Russia. The Baltic States and Poland were cut bodily out of Russian territory, while Rumania holds the former Russian province of Bessarabia under military occupation. Each side mistrusts the other, and each side is constantly practicing espionage on the other. For example, in June, 1925, a Soviet court condemned no less than seventeen spies. Russia spies on Poland, on Rumania, on Esthonia, on Latvia, Lithuania and Finland; and these States reciprocate. Scarcely a month goes by without the arrest of spies in one or another of the border States or in Russia, and the arrest is usually followed by an execution.

In addition, Russia is interested in wiping out the worst of the old Czarist secret police. Thus last Summer Russia was thrilled by the trial of the blind old woman, Anna Egorovna Serebrakova, "the grandmother of the Czar's secret police," who had sent scores of men and women to death or exile. At the same time almost every country has accused the Russians of practicing international espionage on a grand scale. France and Spain found Red propaganda in the Riff; Great Britain faces the same situation in India and China; even the United States, remote from most of the causes and problems of European statesmanship, has been embarrassed and annoyed by the few Soviet agitators in America.

The fact seems to be that it takes two to make a spy-scare. In the first place, the party employing the spy must believe that the confidential information desired is worth the price paid in terms of friendly relations; in the second place, the party spied upon must believe that this information is vitally important to the national defense.

Numerical Strength.

Neither of these elements is, normally, worth serious entertainment. The strength of an army or a navy rests on many things besides mere mechanical or material factors. First and most obvious, the question of numerical strength is involved. The strength of every army is well known and is obviously easy to ascertain. No increase in technical equipment is possible on a large scale without a corresponding industrial activity which is quickly reflected in stock market and other operations. In the same way, movements of troops, especially troop concentrations, are relatively easy to detect in time of peace. Military attachés in every country are in a position to keep a check on all these major factors; minor elements, such as new field gun designs and new airplane motors, can be spotted as soon as an attempt is made to supply them on a large scale. The system of permissible political, economic, naval and military espionage practiced through diplomacy is ample to keep other countries informed in a broadly practical way.

Brig. Gen. Waters, who was formerly British military attaché at St. Petersburg and Berlin, in a recent book made the statement that underground espionage was almost worthless. He cited one instance where the Russian Embassy at London paid a large sum to obtain drawings of some new military works near Folkestone or Dover which could easily have been seen by an ordinary tourist. He states that, in practice, the best way is to assume that the enemy is absolutely up-to-date and that a position which has been fortified is fortified as strongly as possible.

This does not prevent, however, some military men from attaching importance to secrets of the other side. In many capitals it was the custom of the General Staff to attempt to sell "secrets" to foreign diplomats in order to embarrass their relations with the political authorities. Only recently an attempt was made to sell one of our consuls in Japan some Japanese naval secrets. The consul promptly reported the matter to the authorities, who eided him to entrap the emissary. Yet not long ago the Italian authorities arrested Mrs. Ella Briggs, a New York architect, for "espionage," because she had taken photographs in the Palermo military zone while stopping off from a passing steamer.

The situation in France is so peculiar from the military point of view that the value of military secrets is enormously enhanced. France has an air force more than twice as strong as those of Great Britain and Italy combined. The French Army in active service consists of 685,000 men, with over 5,000,000 reserves, while the British Army is only 152,000 and 200,000 reserves and that of Italy is 220,000 in active service, with 4,000,000 trained reserves. Thus France can put nearly twice as many men in the field at the outbreak of hostilities as can her two strongest neighbors. Similarly, the French Navy is concentrating on the submarine service, which could threaten Great Britain from the Channel and Italy from the African as well as the French coast. But if France ever went to war and her first rush were halted, it would be easy for a strong military and industrial power to ruin her.

In consequence, both France and the neighbors of France are inclined to attach an exaggerated importance to the details of French military and naval armaments. France wants to hold the decisive advantage, for that—from the defensive point of view—is her only permanent security; her neighbors wish to discover whether the French superiority is in fact so marked as to offer France a quick victory in any European conflict. From this it follows that the intelligence departments of France, Italy, Germany and Great Britain will make every effort to obtain the latest information about their comparative strength.

TEA CHAMPIONSHIP OPEN TO AMERICA

IS America drinking more tea? A statistician in Europe thinks so, and credits this increase to prohibition. He says that if, a few years ago, representatives of various nations had attended a "ratio" tea party, the Englishman would have had to drink 1,800 cups, the American 400, the Russian 275, the German 36, the Austrian 20, the Frenchman 18 and the Italian 1 cup.

Today the American would find himself called upon to make away with a great many more than 400 cups of tea at such a party. In fact, the present statistics fan believes that "if the Americans really gave their mind to it no doubt they could become champion tea-drinkers"—just as they have of late demonstrated a capacity for carrying off world championships of several sorts.

NEW YORK OF CENTURY AGO PRAISED IN BRIDE'S LETTERS

WONDERS of the New York of one hundred years ago are enthusiastically described in letters that have recently come to light. A young woman from up-State who had married and come to this city to live, addressed these letters to friends in her native town. The modern New Yorker would have been little impressed with the metropolis of 1826, but evidently the city even in that provincial period was no less engaging to strangers than it is today.

The young bride was particularly captivated by the principal park of the city. She describes in detail its winding paths where one forgot the presence of the city, its wooded section and profuse foliage and broad lawns. The park thus glorified was the region facing the City Hall. The beauty of the City Hall also won her; the building dominated the city and was beyond comparison its noblest structure.

Several of the letters dwell upon the gayety of the great theatre, facing the park, on Park Row. It seated 1,200. About it were to be found several restaurants which catered to theatregoers, anticipating the Great White Way by just a century. Meals were often served between the acts.

No feature of the town so impressed the author of the letters as the promenade at the Battery. The Battery Walk, as it was known, was open to all and "here every afternoon the fashionables of the city met to strut about and be admired." Parades were frequent. The view of the harbor from the Battery Walk was much admired, and all visitors were taken there to enjoy it. Lower Broadway was then a stately residential and hotel street. The letters describe glowingly the balls and musicales given at the City Hotel just above Trinity Church.

Fulton Market, then one of the show places of New York, occupied the same location it does today. One of the curiosities noted at the market was the display of game birds, many of which are unfamiliar to present-day housekeepers. There were at times fifty different varieties of game birds including, as the letters record, hrant, black duck, gray duck, canvasback duck, wood duck, widgeon, teal, broad bill, sheldrake, old wife and also the woodcock.

MICHIGAN TAKES ACTIVE STEPS TO RENEW DEPLETED FORESTS

CONCERN for her fast-disappearing forests has lately stirred Michigan. Ten million of her once forested acres now lie idle—one-twentieth of the total idle land in the United States. And 750,000 of these idle acres are State-owned, acquired in lieu of delinquent taxes. Lately these vast unproductive expanses have claimed the interest of forward-looking citizens. The State Department of Conservation recently called to its aid the leading authorities on the subject of reforestation and took them on a tour to study what has been done and what can be done to provide wood for the future. Hereafter such a forestry tour will occur annually in Northwestern Michigan.

The Wolverine State did not await the arrival of experts before setting to work, however. Her 1926 program, calling for the reforestation of 12,000 acres this year, is said to be the largest of the sort ever planned in America. In the State Forest dense stretches of timber now cover land that twenty years ago was growing corn. Last year 6,000 more acres were planted. The nursery produces 25,000,000 seedlings of pine a year. The United States Forest Service, in the National Forest at East Tawas, has set a good example, having planted more than 13,000 acres of pine.

The cost of this work—the average for the last five years, including seedlings, nursery work, planting, depreciation on equipment, &c.—is put at $3.35 an acre.

In cold weather every motor needs

PINES WINTERFRONT
IT'S AUTOMATIC

WINTERFRONT models for all cars $22.50 to $30 Put on in 10 Mins.

WINTERFRONT for Ford .....$15.00 Chevrolet ..$17.50 Dodge $20.00

Many fine cars come WINTERFRONT-equipped

Pierce-Arrow, Packard "8," Peerless "8" and De Luxe "6," Willys-Knight Big "6" and Wills St. Claire have adopted Winterfront as a cold weather necessity.

WINTERFRONT is the only automatic radiator shutter manufactured

Installed in ten minutes, Winterfront requires no attention after it is on the car. The shutters open and close automatically according to the heat requirements of the motor.

Summertime smoothness all winter long

Motors that are protected by Winterfronts are free from the jerky operation so common in the "warming-up" period in unprotected motors. Winterfront-equipped motors are always at the correct operating temperature. This means smoother operation and longer motor life—and lower gasoline consumption.

Don't give cold a chance at your motor: see your local distributor to-day.

The New
TURNING POINT IN MOTOR CAR DESIGN

The new, finer Chrysler "70" is a turning point in motor car body design—forecasting the new vogue in motoring for years to come.

Newer, more exquisitely graceful bodies of exclusive Chrysler design—newer, more distinctive silhouette with military front and cadet visor—newer luxury of comfort—newer, greater riding ease—newer richness of upholstery—newer, finer hardware and fittings—newer refinements in controls and lighting—newer, more attractive color blendings far in advance of current harmonies.

And with this newer appearance the new, finer Chrysler "70" offers the proved superiority of performance, dependability, economy, and long life which are Chrysler.

For it is basically the same famous Chrysler "70" chassis, save for valuable refinements, which we are eager to convince you by demonstration, is more emphatically than ever years ahead of contemporary achievement.

Prices of the New "70" Are Radically Lower

Notwithstanding the greater beauty and comfort of the new, finer Chrysler "70", and the advancements and refinements—resulting from Chrysler's unique plan of Quality Standardization—which greatly enhance the "70's" quality and value, prices have been radically lowered as follows:—

	New Prices	Old Prices	Savings
Roadster	$1495	$1525	$ 30
Brougham	1525	1745	220
Coupe	1545	1695	150

PRESBYTERIANS RAISE MONEY FOR PENSIONS

Drive for Local Quota of the $15,000,000 Fund Will Open On Dec. 3—Will H. Hays Directs It—Clergy and Their Dependents Are to Benefit

THE Presbyterian Church in the United States is engaged in a campaign to raise $15,000,000 for its service pension plan, which will provide pensions and compensation for its aged and disabled ministers. Will H. Hays, as Chairman of the Laymen's Committee, is directing the drive, and when the fund is established it will be administered by a committee of which Andrew W. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, is a member.

The service pension plan aims to do away with the necessity of calling upon charity to aid those ministers who have grown old in the service of the Presbyterian Church. "The world's one essential industry," said Mr. Hays in explaining the purpose of the drive, "is religion, and being an industry it must adopt industry's methods along certain lines. By that I mean that a church must provide for the care of those who have given it a lifetime of service, in the same manner in which big business is caring for those in its employ."

Mr. Hays, the high commissioner of the Motion Picture Producers' Association, is for the time being contributing a large percentage of his time to the campaign, and he has the assistance of a group of prominent business men representing different sections of the country. Mr. Hays foresees a spiritual revival as a consequence of the pension plan. Worthy men, he believes, will have more courage to enter the Church when they know that in old age they will not be dependent on others.

The Fear of Poverty.

"Consider for a moment," he said, "that for a lifetime of devotion the average material compensation of preachers is less than that paid our ditch diggers. The thinning ranks of prospective ministers should make us pause. We are expecting too much of human nature when we ask men to dedicate themselves and their families to present penury and future hardships. Were they not of strong character, reconciled to devoting their lives to the service of God and their fellow-men at immeasurable personal sacrifice, the attractions to them in commercial life, where intellectuality is bound to find reward, would already have demoralized the effective preaching of the gospel.

"They are only human, after all. They are asked to serve not in heaven but on earth, not in paradise but in New York and Chicago and Baltimore and in 10,000 towns where milk costs so much a quart, eggs so much a dozen and meat so much a pound. It is not work but worry that kills."

Mr. Hays drew attention to the fact that in almost any other walk of life a man who does not provide for his own old age and who does not make some preparation for the welfare of his dependents is looked upon as a failure, and yet the minister has to face his future with the fear of poverty in his heart.

"If you would realize what the minister means to the individual or to the community, try to imagine what existence would be without him—no worship, no sacraments, no baptism, no marriage ceremonies except the signing of a contract; at the grave the lowering of the coffin in silence, with no word of tomorrow. We could not bear it a week. We could not exist as a nation if we did not have among us, working early and late, interpreters of God, reminding us in days of prosperity as in days of adversity that, in the last analysis, the eternal things are the only things that count."

From all sides letters of gratitude and approval are reaching the executives of the pension fund, and ministers are expressing their desire to become a part of the scheme that will protect them and the men who are to follow in their footsteps. From the correspondence that lay before him, Mr. Hays drew a letter just received. It was written by a minister's wife and ran as follows:

"My husband is on the list that I have the greatest sympathy for, namely, the retired ministers who are physically incapacitated, and were I not able to work I do not see how he could get along. I am in my seventieth year, and have been working continuously since 1924, and have traveled nearly every week about sixty miles a day. Recently I have had heart trouble, and have been obliged to stay at home, and a fall injured my optic nerve, so that my sight is much impaired. My husband has lost the sight of one eye and requires a magnifying glass to see print with the other.

"If I did not work with my pen, as well as otherwise, I do not know how we would live. I am thankful that I have lived to see the men aroused to keeping their wornout ministers from being dependent upon charity."

New York's Quota $3,000,000.

The drive will be opened in the Synods of New York, New Jersey and New England with a dinner at the Biltmore Hotel on the evening of Dec. 3. The amount to be raised in the three districts is $4,350,000, of which the New York quota is $3,000,000. Pennsylvania has already gone over the top with $3,000,000. It is expected that the entire sum of $15,000,000 will have been obtained by May 23, 1927, when the next Presbyterian General Assembly meets in San Francisco.

The pension plan is not a new one on the part of the Presbyterian Church. Somewhere, 210 years ago, an unknown group of men worked out a pension system, the first of its kind on the American continent. It was called the "Fund for Pious Uses."

The system as evolved and handed down by past generations is considered inadequate to cope with present-day problems. It provides for an annuity of $500 a year, payable at the age of 65 or 70. The minister is called upon to pay one-fifth of the annual premium, the church at large being expected to contribute the other four-fifths. But there are two obvious defects in this antiquated scheme.

Old System Inadequate.

First of all, the allotted amount is not in adequate relation to the average salary of the minister; and, second, the Church has found it impossible to fulfill its obligation, so that it is now facing a deficit of $2,000,000. The result of this shortage of funds has been that hundreds of men have received approximately $370 a year, while 1,000 widows were paid only an average of $244. More often than not aged men and women find themselves without any other source of income when their waning strength unfits them to continue with the arduous tasks of parish work.

Under the new plan the minister and the widow will, it is held, automatically receive what is their just due. The plan has been under consideration for some time and has been developed with the help of leading actuaries. It is based on life insurance experience.

Outlining the manner in which it will function, Mr. Hayes explained that a reasonably adequate pension will be provided for every worker in the service of the Church. The minimum annual pension will be $600, the maximum $2,000. Ministers, missionaries and educators who have served for thirty-five years will be eligible for this compensation when they reach the age of 65, without regard to retirement. The payment made will about equal one-half the average salary during that period.

Stipends to Widows and Orphans.

The money to cover the pension will be drawn from annual premium payments of 10 per cent. of the salary of the minister; of it 2½ per cent. is to be paid by the annuitant, the remaining 7½ by the individual church or organization with which he is connected. Four thousand ministers and churches are required to make the plan sound from an insurance standpoint. Indications are that more than that number will vote to participate within a reasonably short time.

Under the system widows will receive a pension equal to one-half that to which their husbands were entitled. Orphan children will be cared for at the rate of $100 a year. Nor have the ministers disabled before the age of retirement been overlooked; upon total disability they, or any other servant of the Church, are entitled to an income equal to 40 per cent. of their average annual income in the five years prior to the time of their infirmity.

It is held that the pension plan will be self-sustaining within fifteen years. At the end of that time premium income and pension outgo will balance each other.

It is estimated that about $5,000,000 will be required to meet in full the obligations indicated: $3,000,000 will be necessary to provide for those who are ineligible because of having reached the pension age at the operative date of the new plan, and $7,000,000 to provide pensions for those who have earned eligibility before its inauguration. After the $15,000,000 is raised, the Presbyterian Church will be enabled not only to meet its future obligations, but to redeem the moral obligation of the past. Once the task is accomplished it will "last for all eternity. As salaries rise to meet the increased cost of living, pensions will increase in ratio. The plan is as solid as the Rock of Gibraltar!"

"We are asking nothing that is not reasonable," said Mr. Hays. "What we are preparing to do is in accordance with the best principles of the pension retirement systems of industrial, financial and transportation enterprises, as well as of other religious denominations, educational foundations and institutions, and civic, governmental and humanitarian bodies."

As the campaign is considered purely a business affair, laymen only are taking part in it. Each church, each Presbytery, each Synod has its laymen's committee. At the head of the entire organization stands the National Committee, an outgrowth of the National Laymen's Committee, of which Mr. Hays is Chairman. Some of those serving on it are; Robert T. Benson, Edward D. Duffield, Dr. J. M. T. Finney, Charles L Huston, Alba B. Johnson, Richard B. Mellon, James H. Post, Samuel Rea, T. Edward Ross, Oliver H. Shoup, W. W. Smith, J. P. Wallace, F. E. Weyerhaeuser, George White, Robert F. Wolfe and George Woodruff.

TRINITY'S TOWER IS BEING WAXED

Paraffin Process, Already Used on Plymouth Rock and Cleopatra's Needle, Preserves The Surface of the Stone

PASSERS-BY wonder what is being done to Trinity Church's tower, now surrounded by scaffolding and being treated by workmen with what seems a mysterious coating. Some observers guess that the structure is being varnished; others that it is getting washed and painted; and one man hazarded that it was being plated with zinc.

What is going forward is the application of paraffin. This is nowadays employed to protect historic buildings and monuments against the teeth of time.

Like all stone buildings, Trinity Church has to be constantly guarded against the inroads of the weather. Since it was built in 1846 the edifice has been carefully watched and every attack of the climate counteracted. The Belleville brownstone of which it was built was a favorite material three-quarters of a century ago, and many public structures and fashionable residences were made of it. Although the pores of this grade of stone are fine, they may be penetrated by moisture in the course of time.

To prevent this, arrangements have been made to treat the entire exterior of the church with a protective coating made mainly of paraffin—a wax obtained from petroleum. This process, developed many years ago by the late Robert M. Caffell, an Englishman, was first employed in this country in 1885 on the Obelisk, or Cleopatra's Needle, which stands in Central Park.

The stone to be anointed is first treated with a chemical solution to prepare it for the reception of the wax. The work on Trinity is being directed by H. de B. Parsons, an engineer, and is intended to keep intact the patina, the beauty of surface.

Heated by Blow Torches.

The mortar in the seams between stones was replaced where necessary in the process of preparation.

Next, small areas of the surface were heated by blow torches, after which melted paraffin was put on with wall brushes. The fluid wax penetrates the stone for one-quarter to half an inch, according to the porosity or molecular structure of the material. Experts say this forms not only a protective film, but so infiltrates the stone itself as to make it impervious to moisture, even in the severest storms. The Obelisk in Central Park required a thorough paraffining, for it is of a stone which had never been subjected to much moisture in the dry climate of Egypt. When it was put in position, less than fifty years ago, many feared that it would so disintegrate that the inscription would be effaced. When the Needle was duly waxed, however, these fears proved groundless.

Memorials Protected.

Not far from that relic from the Nile stands an American structure which has been similarly protected. It is the façade of what was once the United States assay office in Wall Street, but is now part of the American wing of the Metropolitan Museum of Art. Plymouth Rock in Massachusetts, where the Pilgrim Fathers landed, has been strengthened against the ravages of the Cape Cod storms by the paraffin process. Other memorials treated with the petroleum wax are the Lafayette statue in Washington, the monument with the figure of George Washington which stands in Baltimore, tombstones in old cemeteries in Connecticut and certain headstones in Trinity churchyard. The tomb of Alexander Hamilton there has undergone a paraffin application.

Before time begins to mellow or stain monuments they are sometimes made proof against moisture by an impervious coating, as was done recently with the Buckingham fountain in Chicago, erected to the memory of one of that city's benefactors.

Many new residences and schoolhouses have been surfaced with various transparent water-proofing mixtures by spraying.

Care must be taken to employ it only in mild weather, as otherwise an unsightly film will develop. In fact, in all water-proofing of this kind, the temperature at which the work is to be performed is stipulated in the contract.

HINDUS AGAIN RAISE CITIZENSHIP QUESTION

Prominent Member of Their Race Wins Second Court Decision in His Fight to Defend Naturalization—Bill to Come Up in Congress

THREE THOUSAND Hindus, long resident in this country, are keenly interested in the recent decision of the United States Court of Appeals restoring the citizenship of Sajaharam Ganeeh Pandit of Los Angeles, a member of the Hindu race. Many of them are confronted with the same situation that Pandit faced when, after enjoying American citizenship for ten years, a Federal Court decision deprived him of that privilege. The rest of them are prevented from acquiring citizenship by the very decision that prohibited Mr. Pandit an alien.

The question whether Hindus are to be classified legally as "white persons" is still unsettled. The latest decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals does not touch upon that issue. It merely confirms the judgment of the lower courts in declaring that Mr. Pandit had not obtained his naturalization certificate by illegal means. The Government may appeal from this decision to a higher court. The status of members of the Hindu, therefore, remains unchanged, and carries with it the same political disability to which the Hindu subject since 1923, when Justice Sutherland of the United States Supreme Court ruled that Hindus were not "white persons," within the meaning of the statute.

To alter this condition Senator Copeland of New York last year introduced a bill in the Senate defining Hindus as white persons and extending to them the right of naturalization. This bill will come up for discussion at the next session of Congress. At its last convention in Detroit the American Federation of Labor passed a resolution endorsing Senator Copeland's bill and instructing the Executive Council to use its efforts to have the bill enacted into a law.

Mr. Pandit, a native of Bombay, and a lawyer and teacher, is a member of the highest Indian caste of Brahmans. He comes of a wealthy family and is the holder of several degrees from universities in India. He came to the United States in 1906 and settled in California. In 1913 he applied for naturalization. The Bureau of Naturalization contested his petition on the ground that he was not a white person. The court, however, decided in his favor and granted him his citizenship papers. Ten years later suit was brought in the United States District Court of Southern California for the cancellation of his citizenship papers on the ground that his certificates of citizenship were illegally obtained.

Supreme Court Ruling.

In its contention the Government based itself on the decision rendered by Justice Sutherland in the case of Bhagat Singh Thind, another Hindu who had been seeking citizenship. This case has since been used as a precedent for all similar cases.

When the appeal came up Mr. Pandit was not permitted to defend his eligibility to citizenship as a "free white person." The only recourse he had was to file a plea of "equitable estoppel"—the non-application of the law because of the great injury and suffering which its enforcement would inflict upon him. He pleaded that the Government, having permitted him to enjoy the rights of citizenship for ten years, would be doing him a great injustice by revoking his papers. It would deprive him, he said, of his legal practice and his commission as notary public. It would make it illegal for him to own his home, and his American wife would lose her birthright citizenship as well as the ownership of a large tract of desert land to which she had established a claim before her marriage.

Mr. Pandit also pleaded that for the sake of becoming an American citizen he has sacrificed his standing as a Brahman in his native land, had forfeited all the privileges and rights accruing to him by virtue of his scholastic degreee and lost his right to a share of his father's estate valued at hnndreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. Pandit won his point. The Government then carried the case to the Circuit Court of Appeals, which again sustained the Hindu.

Throughout the long contest Mr. Pandit has vainly sought a reconsideration of the objections raised by Justice Sutherland to Hindus coming within the meaning of the term "white" and hence to granting them the right to naturalization. In denying the plea that Bhagat Singh Thind was a "Caucasian" and therefore white, Justice Sutherland said:

"Caucasian" is a conventional word of much flexibility, as a study of the literature dealing with racial questions will disclose, and while it and the words 'white persons' are treated as synonymous for the purposes of that case, they are not of identical meaning.

"In the endeavor to ascertain the meaning of the statute we must not fail to keep in mind that it does not employ the word 'Caucasian,' but the words 'white persone,' and these words are of common speech and not of ecientific origin. The word 'Caucasian,' not only was not employed in the law, but was probably wholly unfamiliar to the original framers of the statute in 1790. • • •

"The words of the statute are to be interpreted in accordance with the understanding of the common man from whose vocabulary they are taken.

"It may be true that the blond Scandinavian and the brown Hindu have a common ancestor in the dim reaches of antiquity, hut the average man knows perfectly well that there are unmistakahle and profound differences between them today.

Language and Race.

"The eligihility of thie applicant for citizenship is based on the sole fact that he is of high-caste Hindu stock, born in Punjah, one of the extreme northwestern districts of India, and classified hy certain scientific authorities as of the Caucasian or Aryan race. The Aryan theory as a racial basis seems to be discredited by most, if not all, modern writers on the subject of ethnology.

"The term 'Aryan' has to do with linguistic, and not at all with physical characteristics, and it would seem reasonably clear that mere resemblance in language, indi.ating a common linguistic root buried in remotely ancient soil, is altogether inadequate to prove common racial origin.

"Our own history has witneseed the adoption of the English tongue by millions of negroee, whose descendante can never be classified racially with the descendants of white persons, notwithstanding both may speak a common root language.

Sutherland's Contention.

"What we now hold is that the words 'free white persons' are words of common speech, to be interpreted in accordance with the understanding of the common man, synonymous with the word 'Caucasian' only as that word is popularly understood. As so understood and used, whatever may be the speculations of the ethnologist, it does not include the body of people to whom the appellee belongs. It is a matter of familiar observation and knowiedge that the physical characteristics of the Hindus render them readily distinguishable from the various groups of persons in this country commonly recognized as white."

Mr. Pandit in his defense contended that the question as set forth by Justice Sutherland became one of color or complexion and not of race. It is impractical to determine race by color only, he said, as there are white persons who show a much darker hue than many of the fairer members of the brown race.

TURKEY PUTS NEW CHECK ON FOREIGN BUSINESS MEN

Closing of Chambers of Commerce in Constantinople Offends Traders of Europe

TURKEY recently closed the American Chamber of Commerce in Constantinople and all other foreign chambers. Although the news did not cause a ripple of comment in the United States, in France and England the outcry was immediate. The Journal de Paris said that the action was not simply directed against foreigners, but was a continuation of Mustapha Kemal's policy to deprive the ancient capital of her former rank and condemn her to vegetate, all because he knowe that she must be the hearth of revolutionary agitation.

That sentence drove the loyal editors of Stamboul to reply. The Vakit came out impatiently:

"All this phraseology is so empty of sense that it is useless for us even to attempt to show it. If the Government of Turkey, presided over by the Gazi Mustapha Kemal Pasha and seated at Angora, had wished to tear from Constantinople her honorable rank it would not have believed it ought to have poured ont the blood of thousands of the country's children in order to take her back from the hands of the Allies."

Ten days after the closing of the Chamber of Commerce the editor of Djumhouriet interviewed Mushine Bey, commercial director of Constantinople, and Nusret Bey, delegate of the Minister of Foreign Affairs, asking for an explanation. They said that in order to protect the special privileges and prerogatives of the Turkish Chamber of Commerce, the foreign chambers would have to be reorganized under the laws of the State as clubs or societies. Mushine Bey said further that their position had been undefined for some time and that the matter had been taken up by the Government at the request of some of the foreign chambers themselves. Nor, he continued, did they feel that the recent decision of the Government was in any way in opposition to their activity.

However that may be, in Paris and London the abrupt closing of the chambers and the lack of Government explanation are considered discourteous. In the second place, they ask why the Chambers of Commerce should change their names since in London there are eleven foreign Chambers of Commerce and in Paris fourteen.

The explanation commonly heard is the intense national pride of the new Turk, his fear of foreigners taking advantage of his weakness and ignorance, and his reliance on the effectiveness of arhitrary government action to control situations.

Coming just when Turkey is making Constantinople a free port with the hope of regaining the transit business which for the last four years has been going to the Piraeus and the Greek island ports, this action is regarded by foreigners as unfortunate for the Turks themselves.

CHILD ART CLASS IN MUSEUM GROWS

Two Districts Alone Send 1,500 Youngsters to The Story Hours—Esthetic Perceptions, Their History and Geography Improved

AFTER the Summer lull, the Metropolitan Museum of Art is again humming with activity. This month the story-hours for boys and girls—found to be a most successful experiment in the teaching of appreciation of art to the young—has been resumed, and a similar course for children of the members of the Museum was begun Nov. 6. Through these courses hundreds of youngsters of school age are acquiring the "museum habit" and developing a taste for the finer things of life.

Twice on Saturday and on Sunday and occasionally on other days, in the lecture hall and galleries, children assemble to listen to the tales connected with canvases and statues. In jolly rivalry the youngsters troop through the building in search of the painted or chiseled characters of the stories. They gather in the work rooms to reproduce costumes, postures and scenes.

The children appear perfectly at home among the pictures, sculptures, tapestries, potteries, furniture, armor, musical instruments and other treasures. They may lack some of the reverence shown by older folk for the works of genius, but their appreciation is in a way warmer, more spontaneous and more knowing.

Prepare Tableaux.

The course in picture study for children was introduced in 1915. The first story-hour was attended by forty pupils. Now the elementary schools and Junior High Schools of Districts 10 and 11 alone send more than 1,500 children, school authorities having recognized the lectures as important aids to study. A notable improvement has been remarked in the children's work in oral and written English, history, geography and drawing. Prizes are awarded to school organizations recording the highest story-hour representation in each year.

The Saturday and Sunday afternoon classes are free to all and no admission cards are required. Besides these there are classes on Wednesdays devoted to dramatics. In these the children prepare for a stage performance at the end of the course. The performance is a summary of the most striking characters discussed. Impersonations are done from memory, without coaching or outside assistance. On Thursdays children are allowed to draw and to model in the galleries. For physically handicapped or crippled children the Museum provides special story hours. From time to time story-lectures are given at schools, libraries and settlements by Museum instructors.

Stories narrated are woven around the most noteworthy paintings, statues, tapestries or other art objects. In most cases the narrator is Anna Curtis Chandler, who takes great pains to make her listeners see the natural setting suggestive of the period and characteristic of the work of art expounded. Dressed as a Colonial Dame she tells, for example, the stirring tale of the Revolution. Leaning back in their chairs or bending forward, the children take in the sounds of words they perhaps do not fully understand and follow with a critical air the purely dramatic phase of the lecture. When this is concluded they warmly applaud. Then lantern slides and a motion picture presenting the details of the story are shown, supplemented by picturesque living tableaux on the stage.

With the ceremonies over and the invitation to come to the next lecture extended, the audience is sent roaming through the various halls of the Museum. This "treasure hunt" is exhilarating. The whole building is wakened from drowsy reveries by the hustle and babble of youth.

The children have monitors, distinguished by yellow handkerchiefs. They patrol the hall during a lecture and see that quiet is maintained. Part of the duty of the monitors is to lead the throng of children to the various galleries where certain works of art are to be inspected.

The monitor system in Miss Chandler's classes was built on the lines of medieval chivalry. This year the children decided that they had outgrown the make-believe form of their organization, though not the spirit or the discipline of chivalry in which they have been trained. A delegation called on Miss Chandler to inform her that their organization is henceforth to be a "creative and dramatic art club."

Week-day museum classes for children are held in school hours and conducted in strict correlation with the studies pursued in the classroom. Often the children themselves are asked to lecture.

Lecture study is now an established and highly successful course in the curriculum of the public schools—due in no small measure to Miss Chandler. For many years she carried on the work almost alone. Then Dr. James Lee, until recently Superintendent of School Districts 10 and 11, extending from Seventy-fifth to 107th Street and from Fifth Avenue to the East River, assisted her efforts. More and more children came to the lectures.

The work of encouraging and maintaining attendance goes on energetically. Dr. Robert J. Forst, the present Superintendent of the two districts, has appointed Albert Loewinthan, Principal of Public School 30, Chairman of a special committee on attendance.

During the Fall and Winter months more than a hundred lectures for children are delivered at the museum. Besides Miss Chandler, speakers are Eleanor W. Foster, Beatrice Bromwell Hersey and Douglas Moore, the latter taking musical themes and illustrating them by aid of the musical instruments in the museum collection.

WHERE SONG BEATS FOOTBALL IN RAISING MONEY FOR COLLEGE

Choral Students Have Built a New Music Hall for St. Olaf in Northfield, Minn.

ST. OLAF COLLEGE at Northfield, Minn., has just opened a new music hall, which has been "built by song," rather than by football. The St. Olaf choir, a body of sixty students which makes annual tours, earns money for the college, and has provided the funds for the music hall. At St. Olaf, the choir is the thing. Candidates for the football team sometimes give up their athletic ambitions to join it.

The St. Olaf students represent largely the farms of Northwest States: Minnesota, Iowa, Wisconsin, North and South Dakota furnishing most of the student-body. The college choir is under the direction of Dr. F. Melius Christianson, and has appeared in virtually every State in the Union, and also toured Europe. The organization seldom fails to earn from $12,000 to $30,000 for the school music fund each year.

The choir is now housed in a Gothic building of gray stone. Interior decorations, especially Dr. Christianson's study, suggested the Viking influence in the school, which is attended largely by students of Norwegian ancestry and of Lutheran belief.

Soon after college opens in the Fall the personnel of the choir is selected. In addition to group rehearsals, each voice is trained separately. Nearly every day the choir practices. The discipline of the group demands complete dedication to the one organization. Each Sunday an appearance is made in St. John's Church.

In Fall and Winter the organization practices à capella the works of Bach and the German school of music created by that composer. There are solos, but the ideal of the group is for fine ensemble work rather than the featuring of any single voice. Most of the vocal arrangements are in eight parts. Dr. Christiansen this year proposes to turn from the strictly Bachian program to include some English and later German compositions in addition to compositions of his own.

This year's tour will take the choir to New York, Boston, Philadelphia in the East, and to Cleveland, Chicago, Indianapolis and Minneapolis among other points in the Central West.

AUTO OWNERS

THERE are today more than 21,000,000 automobiles in use throughout the United States, an average of one for every family, or one for every six persons. Great Britain averages one automobile to every fifty-five of its population. France is in about the same position. Germany has one automobile to every 83; Japan, one to every 1,800; Russia, one to every 7,500; China, one to every $1,000. This survey shows future markets.

Paige-Jewett Smash All Records for OCTOBER

GREATEST October in Paige history! Paige shipments were 60% greater than in October last year—greater than any year before—greater even than the banner year of 1922!

In all the 18 successful Paige years—there's never been such a spontaneous—wholehearted—nation-wide—demand as that which greeted the smart new style cars in the new Paige-Jewett line!

This tremendous new enthusiasm for Paige and Jewett cars was almost a foregone conclusion. Paige deliberately set out to capture popular approval by building in addition to sound, serviceable, dependable cars—cars of bewitching beauty and engaging charm—cars that could and would be accepted instantly as style leaders of all motordom!

You'll understand the reason for Paige-Jewett popularity the moment you see these distinctive new cars. The very lines of their striking new bodies denote style—their appointments are as charming and complete as those of the costliest custom-built creations—their sturdy chassis are silent, dependable and enduring—their whole atmosphere is one of ultra-refinement, unquestioned good taste, smart and distinctive exclusiveness.

Beautiful New Jewett Sedan

Before you buy, compare these new Paige-Jewett cars with any others. In all, there are fourteen body types and color combinations (style leaders every one!) at factory list prices ranging from $1195 to $2245. Entirely without obligation, we will be glad to have you drive the type you most prefer.

ANNIE OAKLEY KNOWN BY GUN

"Champion Rifle Shot" a Sufficient Address—Chipped Ash From Wilhelm's Cigarette—Bullets Lifted Home Mortgage

WHEN Annie Oakley, the most expert woman rifle shot ever known, died in Greenville, Ohio, the other day there passed from the stage a vivid and picturesque character known all over the world. Those who saw her at the height of her fame in the days of Buffalo Bill's Wild West will remember a slight figure in flaring skirt, short skirts and leggins who accurately smashed glass balls with a rifle, shot the ash off a man's cigarette at fifty yards and in many other ways demonstrated remarkable skill with firearms.

Probably the most spectacular incident of the many that starred her career occurred in Berlin, when the famous cigarette-shooting trick was performed on no less a personage than the Crown Prince, later Kaiser William II. Annie Oakley's bullet passed but four inches from his head.

She had been giving exhibitions, and the Crown Prince announced that it was his wish to have the ash-flipping feat with himself as the subject. Frank Butler, Annie Oakley's husband and manager, did not at all fancy royalty as the holder of the cigarette; but he made it made no difference. Her hand was steady, her eye keen. Her rifle cracked and the Crown Prince's ash vanished.

Gets Husband by Shooting.

Even in later years, after she had retired to private life, her skill never deserted her. A railroad accident in 1901 resulted in injuries that brought on total paralysis to one side of her body; yet after her recovery she continued to hang up record after record. As late as 1922 she broke 100 clay pigeons in succession at Pinehurst, while during the World War she visited a host of cantonments in the East, giving exhibitions with the rifle, revolver and shotgun and offering advice in sharpshooting to the soldiers in training.

She fired her first shot as a child of 8 or 9, and the "kick" from it broke her nose. It was typical of Annie Oakley that her first experience seemed only to make her more keen for what was to become her life work. Her father had died when she was 4, and a good deal of the family's support came from hunting game. Annie, it is told, used to follow her older brother on his shooting excursions, begging him to let her have a try with his shotgun. Finally, hoping to dissuade her permanently, he loaded his weapon with an extra charge and pointed out a bird to her. Annie's finger curled around the trigger and the gun exploded. She broke her nose, but the bird came down.

Within a few years she was not only supporting the family by her exhibition shooting, but was also bringing in so much game that she was able to sell it in the market and pay off the mortgage on the home. At 16 her fame had reached such a point that she was pitted in a rifle competition against Frank Butler, an expert sharpshooter. Losing the match and his heart at the same time, he became both her husband and her manager.

Not long after this she joined Buffalo Bill's show and toured America and the Continent, evoking astonishment and admiration wherever she appeared. "I never had a contract with Buffalo Bill," she told a questioner once, "You see, I didn't need any. Even with all the numbers of men and women, cowboys, Comanches, Cossacks and Arabs, we remained just one big family."

The famous frontiersman and "Missie," as he always called her, were the firmest of friends through all their acquaintance, and when Buffalo Bill retired Annie Oakley ceased giving public exhibitions. Some of her feats seem almost incredible—such as shooting pennies off men's heads and puncturing the spots out of aces pitched into the air. Once, when it was suggested that she was using birdshot cartridges, in her trick of breaking flying glass balls with her rifle, she insisted that a committee of investigators load her weapon. She continued cheerfully to break the balls, and the committee discontinued its suggestion of unfair means.

Edward VII of England, after seeing her in action, called her "the best rifle shot in the world," and presented her with a medal by way of showing his esteem. Sitting Bull, the celebrated Indian warrior, had his own name for her: "Little Sureshot." When he died he bequeathed her all his property.

Annie Oakley met many of "the crowned heads of Europe" in the course of her tours with Buffalo Bill, and at one time made her appearance before no less than five Queens and two Kings. Among the presents she received from royalty was a silver set given her by Queen Victoria. Eventually she became so well known that letters merely addressed, "Annie Oakley, champion rifle shot," used to reach her without trouble.

Adopted Eighteen Children.

"Shooting is a splendid exercise," she said once. "You can figure it out this way. My gun weighs seven pounds and I shoot somewhere around 150 shots a day. That means I lift 1,000 pounds a day."

There was little about firearms that Annie Oakley did not know. At one time she saved the life of an innocent man by her expert testimony at a trial for murder. Always anxious to help her companions of the tanbark, she appeared in a New Jersey court to assist the defendant, a circus rider. The defendant, charged with shooting a bartender, asserted that he had tossed his automatic pistol on the bar in payment for a drink and that it had gone off accidentally. Annie Oakley convinced the Judge that an automatic pistol could actually be exploded by throwing it down suddenly and the circus rider was acquitted.

Annie Oakley had plenty of other interests besides her firearms. She was probably the first advocate of the one-piece bathing suit for women, coming out for it as early as 1894. She also supported and educated an adopted family of eighteen children, which naturally required a good deal of her time.

It was Ban Johnson who coined the name "Annie Oakley" for a free theatrical or sports pass. A baseball "fan" who rented out his season ticket had so many holes punched in it that Johnson said it looked as if it had been shot at by Annie Oakley. The name became a synonym for free passes and spread even to England and Australia.

INDIA'S UNTOUCHABLES FIND NEW FRIENDS

A BLOW at India's caste system is seen by a writer in The Labor Gazette of Bombay in the recent establishment of a "Committee for the Depressed Classes," which has opened an employment office in Lahore for the purpose of trying to induce employers in the Punjab to make wider use of the "untouchables."

Many of these unfortunates are good farmers, artisans and domestic servants, but their employment is limited by the ancient caste rules and their general condition is miserable. At the same time there is always a demand for labor in the Punjab and workers are often brought in from other provinces.

Cuts Gas Bills in Half

Low first cost is only part of your saving on an Overland Whippet.

Its outstanding economy of 30 miles on a gallon of gasoline—well over 1,000 miles on a gallon of oil . . . with the smallest tax rating of any car in America today, cuts present operating costs just about in half. And doubles the value of every dollar you now spend for upkeep.

In a recent economy driving test in Chicago 1308 contestants averaged 31.8 miles per gallon . . . the winner averaged 47.2 miles per gallon. And scores of Whippets were sold as the result of this demonstration.

In fairness to yourself, think of economy before buying any light car today.

MOTOR HIGHWAYS FAST EXTENDING

Secretary Jardine Outlines National Progress In Ten Years—One Transcontinental Route Nearly Completed

THERE is one transcontinental route in the United States which, Secretary of Agriculture William M. Jardine told the American Association of State Highway Officials last week, is 97 per cent. improved. This is the motor highway from Washington to San Diego in Southern California, 3,133 miles in length. Of this mileage, 2,957 miles are surfaced. 131 graded and drained, leaving only 95 miles unimproved.

The route runs from Washington through St. Louis, Texarkana and El Paso to San Diego. Of the surfaced portion more than half is improved with bituminous macadam or higher cost types, and the remainder is gravel. From Washington to St. Louis there is no unimproved section and nearly 96 per cent. is surfaced with bituminous macadam or one of the higher-type roadways. It was pointed out that while this ronte does not coincide with any of the United States routes, it indicates the splendid progress made by the States it traverses in the completion of important trans-State routes.

"Considered from the standpoint of improvement," said Mr. Jardine, "the next ranking transcontinental route is that from Atlantic City to Astoria. Of its total length of 3,240 miles 12 per cent. is still unimproved, another 12 per cent. is graded and drained, and the remaining 75 per cent. is improved with some form of wearing surface. Of other east and west routes, that from Norfolk to Los Angeles is 68 per cent. improved and that from Chicago to Los Angeles, partly by the same line, is 63 per cent. improved. From Boston to Seattle, through the northern tier of States, the most direct through route is 73 per cent. improved and 60 per cent. surfaced."

National Highway Progress.

These routes, it was explained, illustrate the working out of the principle, as defined in the Federal highway legislation, of the completion of interstate rontes. To complete them for satisfactory motor traffic is a matter of closing gaps. Mr. Jardine said he believed this work could be finished by 1930 without difficulty, and he urged the State officials to cooperate to the fullest extent with the Bureau of Public Roads in perfecting the main highway systems of the United States.

The convention of State highway officials was held at Pinehurst, N. C., and was attended by many of the leading highway engineers. Secretary Jardine presented a comprehensive picture of the progress of good roads work during the past decade and stressed the importance of connecting up the unimproved sections of the great transcontinental highways between the various States. Due to the constantly increasing volume of motor traffic, adequate road construction must be recognized as one of the greatest responsibilities resting upon the Government and the individual States.

"In 1916 the were less than 2,500,000 motor vehicles in the country," said Mr. Jardine, "and less than 73,000 were registered as motor trucks. Today the trucks alone are more numerous than all motor vehicles at that time.

"In 1916 there were approximately 277,000 miles of surfaced roads in the country, only a small percentage of which were of the types now regarded as adequate for motor traffic. Today the mileage of surfaced roads is nearly if not quite twice as great as it was ten years ago and more than 100,000 miles are improved with types of surface more satisfactory than water-bound macadam—a record of progress the more remarkable if it is remembered that during this ten-year period it has been necessary to reconstruct a large part of the mileage previously constructed.

"Ten years ago there vere only five States in which there was as much as a single improved trans-State highway. They were Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey and Maryland. Today twenty-five States have improved highways continuous from border to border in at least one direction and sixteen have completed trans-State arteries in two directions.

Progress in Ten Years.

"In 1916 there were sixteen States in which there was no State Highway Department that could be recognized as competent to administer the construction of Federal-aid roads, and in only a few cases was there any clear conception of a connected State highway system. Today every State has a definitely designated highway system to the improvement of which the State officials are applying their resources.

"These remarkable changes distinguish the last decade as the most important in highway history; but the developments which are destined to have the most far-reaching influence upon the future are the establishment of the Federal-aid policy and the elaborate researches which have been carried out by the Federal and State departments and other agencies. Under the Federal-aid policy 56,000 miles of road have been improved.

"In contemplating the future, I am impressed with the necessity of making adequate provision for the increasing service expected of the highways. If the number of motor vehicles has increased from 2,500,000 to 80,000,000 in ten years, there is no reason to believe that the increase will be abruptly halted although we may expect some falling off in the rate. As traffic increases directly in proportion to the motor vehicles in service we must expect that the conditions for which we now build will be intensified in the future. The highway service must be capable of expansion to meet the needs of growing traffic."

Mr. Jardine said there remained to be improved by the various States to complete the national highway eyetem about 80,000 miles and he made it clear that the completion of that road mileage should be of prime importance to the State Highway Department.

"The lack of trans-State routes in the agricultural States of the Mississippi Valley," he added, "is not in keeping with the general East and West development. In some States this condition has been due to dependence upon county financing rather than npon any lack of need of such roads. There should be an energetic effort to improve the missing links, not because they are transcontinental routes, but because these unimproved sections lie on the most important State routes, and the failure to improve them imposes a handicap upon the people of each State in the satisfactory use of their own road systems.

"The national use must not be lost sight of, nor the requirement of the national legislation that these interstate ronte shall be expedited. The department has not attempted to dictate the routes which should be regarded as major State routes. Each State highway department has expressed in a definite way the routee which are of the greatest importance. The system of interstate routes has been built from the local viewpoint upward and not from the transcontinental viewpoint downward."

Mr. Jardine also pointed ont, in planning for future highway neede, the desirability of acquiring rights of way of ample width so that, when the need arises, it will be possible without heavy expense or the injury of private property to effect necessary improvements. The same policy also suggests the location of improved highwaye in relation to railroads at crossings in euch a manner as to provide for eeparation of grades, and also to provisione for the construction of future by-pass highwaye around cities, and the diversion of traffic from routes of growing congestion.

The nniform signing and numbering of the United States highway routes in accordance with the plane now devised, added Mr. Jardine, are essential in order to establieh it in the public mind as an entity. They are needed also to develop the maximum degree of service and safety in their use by the ever increasing pnblio traffic. From the Federal point of view the early improvement of these routes is of large importance.

ACTIVITY IN THE MOTOR TRADE

PRODUCTS of all divisions of the antomotive industry will be represented in the National Automobile Show in New York next January. The Motor and Accessory Manufacturers' Association, which cooperates in the ehow, has completed allotments to manufacturers of motors, bodies, parts, accessories and garage equipment. They will inclnde a wide range of articles, from piston rings and other small parts to motors, bodies and heavy ehop equipment.

The Paige-Detroit Motor Car Company announces that 402,733 suggestions have been received in its offer of a $10,000 prize for the best slogan to be used for the new model Jewett car. It will require about a month to classify the ballots and select the winner.

LeRoy Moody and W. de Rahm are fitting up a ehow and salesroom in the Ritz Tower Building, Park Avenue and Fifty-seventh Street, for the display of custom built bodies on the Stutz safety chassis. It is announced that Prince Serge Obolensky, brother-in-law of Vincent Astor, has ordered a Stutz car with a body constructed by Fleetwood.

E. H. Miller has been elected President of the Yellow Taxi Corporation of this city. For twelve years he has been in charge of a Newark taxicab company which operates 500 cabs in Newark, Montclair and the Orangee. The Yellow Taxi Corporation in this city operatee 2,000 cabs.

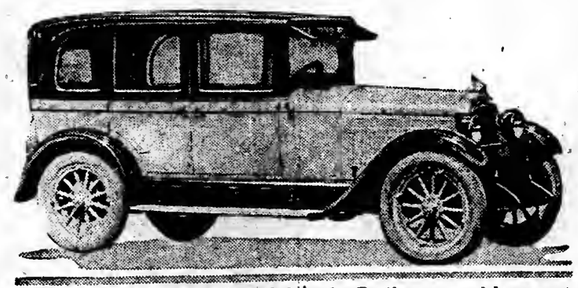
The stabilizer and shock absorber manufacturing business of Robert H. Hassler, Inc., of Indianapolis, has been purchased by a group of New York and Chicago bankers in association with Guy Lommon, Vice President of the Hassler company, who will be President of the new company.

The Ryan-Lite, the new antomobile headlight which has shown in laboratory and road tests to give long range without dangerous glare, as well as a wide side-beam illumination, will be placed on the market this season by the Indiana Lamp Corporation, according to Walter D'Arcy Ryan, the inventor, a director of the General Electric Illuminating Engineering Laboratory.

A new Velie model known as the standard elx eedan has just been brought out. It ie fitted to a 112-inch wheelbase chassis, ie equipped with four doors, four wheel brakes and heal indicator on the daeb. It marks the entrance of Velie into the $1,000 field.

The Buick Motor Company reports that it sold more cars this year than were delivered to owners during the entire year of 1925. Total retail deliveries from January through September amounted to 202,368 cars. The record for 1925 was 200,041 cars.

PONTIAC LANDAU SEDAN MODEL



The landau-sedan recently added to the Pontiac car models presents an attractive anpearance with its low-slung Fisher body mounted on the standard six-cylinder chassis of 110-inch wheelbase. Exterior finish is green, with the hood and wheels in black. The rear quarter is in dark-colored leather.

BAY STATE MOTORISTS FILE INSURANCE RATE OBJECTIONS

REPORTS from many localities of Massachusetts indicate a strong current of dissatisfaction among certain motor interests regarding the compulsory automobile insurance law which becomes effective in that State on Jan. 1. The present opposition is dir ted not so much against the law self as against the rates for som ypes of vehicles as announced early in the Fall by the State Insurance Commissioner. The chief complaints have thus far come from taxicab and fl truck owners.

The passenger car owner has accepted the law and the authorized rates with equanimity, and complaints from that quarter are said to be negligible. Few owners of passenger cars will feel their insurance charge, which will amount to about $30 per car on an average. Many of them already carry liability insnrance at a mnch higher premium than will be charged under the new law.

Some motorists believe the law will benefit the great class of drivers by eliminating from the highways the "traveling junk," such as the battered and wrecked flivvers and the other antique models driven by reckless youths, ignorant foreigners and devil-may-care operators whose net loss would be about $20 if their vehicles were completely demolished in an accident.

Taxicab Insurance Opposition.

The taxicab inte its have petitioned the courts for a hearin on the taxicab rates promulgated by the State Commissioner. They assert that to pay those rates it will be necessary to increase the taxicab fares. Of all the complaints the taxi men seem to have the most equitable grievance. They will be subject to large premium charges. These charges, they contend, will be larger than their annual bill for damages.

They further state that a company operating 100 cabs, for instance, must take out liability insurance amounting to $500,000. Past experience would seem to sustain their contention that 100 cabs would have to inflict an enormous amount of injuriee to warrant the carrying of such liability insurance.

A referee appointed by the Court is conducting hearings on the taxicab rate situation and a decision is expected to be announced before the close of the present month, while the prevailing opinion is that little change will be made at present, it is believed there will ultimately be some readjustment. Their rates are based on the mileage operation of their cabs, with a minimum rate per cab.

Truck Fleet Complaints.

The truck fleet owners seem to have a just complaint against the new law. In the main they have not opposed compulsory insurance. They have, for the most part, carried liability insurance as a matter of every-day business precaution. Hitherto they have been permitted to obtain "fleet rates," that ie, they paid a cheaper rate than the man who insured only one truck. This is bona fide business procedure in any line of business.

Under the new law, however, they receive no concession for insuring an entire fleet. Such rating has been termed discriminatory by the Attorney General, and, as such, against the law which saye that all rates must be "non-discriminatory." The outlook for the fleet owners ie not bright at this time. It is believed that only an amendment to the law can benefit them in any degree.

Believe Law Is Permanent Fixture.

Since the enactment of the law and the announcement of the rates, the insurance companies have maintained a discreet silence. They have issued no etatements, have kept in the background and have little, if anything, to say. They have a fear of State insurance and they realize that the best play they can make is to keep out of the picture. Privately, insurance officials declare compulsory insurance ie in Massachusetts to stay. It is, of necessity, only an experiment at present, they say, but its minor difficulties will be ironed out in time and the Massachusetts law will serve as a model for similar legislation in other States.

Some motorists believe the insurance companies will have difficulty in handling the rueh of applicants in the latter part of December. They point out that inexperienced clerks will have to eecure their plates and that these men will have insufficient experience in filling out the regietration applications. Thie, they believe, will retard the work and will result in a grand mix-up in January, which will cause many motorists to be deprived of their licenses and their right to drive for several weeks.

The insurance men answer this by saying that several hundred extra employee will be taken on before Jan. 1 to prevent the occurrence of such a condition.

FILL MOTOR POSITIONS

President Charles Clifton of the National Automobile Chamber of Commerce has made the following new committee appointments:

Motor Truck Committee, P. L. Emerson and L. L. Woodward.

Street Traffic Committee, P. L. Emerson.

Truck Standards Committee, George A. Green.

PRICES WON FOR ROAD ADORNMENT

New York Architect Receives First Award in Traffic Signal Design for Biscayne Boulevard at Miami

S. GRILLO of thie city and H. Roy Kelley of Los Angelee have been awarded first prizes in the two competitions offered by the Biscayne Boulevard Association of Miami for the architectural development of that thoroughfare. Mr. Grillo won the first prize of $1,000 for the best design submitted for observation towere and traffic signal standards. Mr. Kelley took the first prize of $750 for his gasoline filling station design.

The competition ie said to be the first architectural competition in the United Statee to develop a unified scheme of street decoration, including the accessories employed in the regulation of automobile traffic.

The architectural plan embraced a conaideration of every phase of the Biscayne Boulevard, which skirts the Miami waterfront. It included not only the design of gasoline filling stations, traffic eignal towers and steel lighting standards, but the improvement of the adjoining buildings, the landscaping of the curbs and of the adjoining parks and plots.

The jurors were Dwight James Baum of New York, Elmer C. Jensen of Chicago, both architects, and James H. Gilman, City Commissioner of Miami.

"Most of the gasoline station deeigne," said the jurors, "showed careful study of the problem, which is greatly in need of a solution. Many streets in the country are marred by horrible examples of poorly designed or contractor-built filling stations, with no redeeming features except that of service to the motorist who ie out of gas."

In the traffic signal design Mr. Kelley won the second prize of $600 and Arthur Dillon of this city got the third award. In the gasoline station contest Edgar Albright and John Donald Tuttle of this city won second and third awards, respectively.

Biscayne Boulevard will be a 100 feet wide thoroughfare, skirting Biscayne Bay from the Miami Beach north for three and one-half miles. The new street starts from the business heart of the city and extends into the residential centre, where it joins the Dixie Highway leading to Jacksonville and the North. Thirty-three business and residential blocks were cut through to make the boulevard.

MOTOR CONDITIONS ON NEW JERSEY HIGHWAYS

DESPITE the construction work on the Lincoln Highway from Jersey City to Newark, traffic is being maintained very satisfactorily. The old wood block side through Kearny and in Newark has been ripped up and that side is closed while being paved. Traffic is using the newly paved south side from Hackensack River Bridge to Newark and the north side of old granite blocks from Belleensack River Bridge to Marsh Avenue, Jersey City.

On the Lincoln Highway west from Rahway to Metuchen the pavement is in fine shape, but motorists are advised to be careful because of the widening construction under way. From New Brunswick to Hightstown and Trenton the road is excellent.

State Route No. 5, from Newark to Springfield, Morristown, Dover, Netcong, Hackettstown and Belvidere is in good condition. From Belvidere to Belvidere new concrete has been opened to traffic except a short distance in Butzville, where a culvert is being built, taking out a blind curve.

WILL TALK ON USED CARS

The second monthly meeting of the National Automobile Dealers' Association will be held tomorrow evening at the Hotel Astor under the auspices of the Automobile Merchants' Association. The chief address will be made by Lane Stephens, who will discuss several phases of the used car problem.

LUXURY
for those who love it most

THE MASTER craftsman's work is never mistaken. Its inherent fineness, its perfection of form, its essential soundness of construction, combining rich beauty with real utility, are instantly recognizable.

In the new Stearns-Knight all of these things find greater expression . . .

Quality . . . beauty of design . . . improved chassis . . . combined with the exclusive advantages of the Knight sleeve-valve engine.

Now, it is possible to obtain freedom from carbon troubles . . . freedom from valve grinding . . . an engine that actually improves with use in any one of nine different body types that make luxury and dependability one.

Inspect the luxury of the new Stearns-Knight. Investigate its outstanding advantages. You will find the degree of fine performance you have always desired in a setting that will appeal to your sense of true luxury. MARMON

the new standard seven-passenger sedan

the highest accomplishment of twenty-five years of fine motor car building and at the most conservative prices in Marmon history

Those who have driven this new Marmon Seventy-five say, without hesitancy, that it is a car ahead of its day—never such vibrationless capability—never such a swift and silent rising tide of power—there is absolutely no faltering, no tremor, no intimation of things mechanical—it is undoubtedly the finest car ever given the Marmon name—the newest development of Marmon's unswerving practice of holding fast to basic principles, while improving and perfecting them—in its entire mechanism there is not one iota of experimentation or of doubt

new engineering advancements in the Series 75 include the exclusive Marmon Steering Stabilizer which insures a new steadiness of steering at any speed in combination with new self-energizing four-wheel brakes wide variety of body styles, in the advanced mode both custom-built and standard — prices, $3195 and upward, f. o. b. factory

CONCERT STARS BOOM RADIO SEASON INTO FULL SWING

GALAXY OF ENTERTAINERS TO FACE THE MICROPHONE

Stars of Opera, Symphony Orchestra, Comedians And Bands on the Air Tomorrow Over Station Network Extending as Far West as Missouri

A GALAXY of musical stars and entertainers will be heard over the air tomorrow night in the celebration attendant to the entrance of the National Broadcasting Company into the broadcasting field with Stations WEAF and WJZ as the nucleus. Impresarios of the chain say that this broadcast, which will begin at 8 o'clock and continue until midnight, will be the most elaborate program that has ever vibrated over the air waves since KDKA radiated the first program on Nov. 2, 1920.

Owen D. Young, Chairman of the Board of Directors of the General Electric Company and Radio Corporation of America, is expected to open the program with a short address and an announcement of the names of the Advisory Council, made up of representatives of various professions and activities in public life. It will be the duty of this council of twelve to advise as to the best type of program, so that discrimination may be avoided and the public may be assured that broadcasting is done in the fairest and best way.

From Opera to Comedy.

The artists performing on this occasion run the gamut from grand opera to comedy, interspersed with orchestral selections from some of the leading musical units in the country. The banquet will be held in the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel. Heading the list of operatic stars is Mary Garden, soprano of the Chicago Grand Opera Company, whose voice will be carried by direct wire from her apartment studio in Chicago to the chain of broadcasters during the program.

Other entertainers booked for the broadcast are: Titta Ruffo, baritone of the Metropolitan Opera Company; Will Rogers, comedian, whose voice will be heard from Independence, Kan., where he will be on Monday night; the New York Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Walter Damrosch; a musical and light opera company; Ilya Baner, pianist; Weber and Fields, comedians; the Goldman band of New York Oratorio Society and the Vitaphone Olsen, Bernie and Rolfe dance orchestras.

The program will be broadcast by WEAF, WJZ, WEEI, WBZ, WTAG, WFI, WGR, WLIT, WRC, WCSH, WEAR, KDKA, WGY, WTAM, WCAE, WJAR, WSAI, WGN, KYW, WHAS, KSD, WOC, WCCO and WDAF. Broadcasting by these stations will begin simultaneously at 8 o'clock, Eastern Standard Time, with the exception of WDAF, which will begin an hour later, and at which will join two hours later. The program will continue until midnight.

Frieda Hempel, soprano, will sing over WEAF's microphone tonight at 9:15 o'clock, Eastern Standard Time. Miss Hempel will be assisted by Ewald Haun, flutist, and Rudolph Gruen, pianist.

The complete program will be as follows: "Ave Maria," Gounod; "Vesper Hymn," Old Russian, Frieda Hempel; "Una Voce" from "I Puritani," Bellini, with orchestra; two Hungarian dances, Brahms, orchestra; "Lullaby," Mozart; "Serenade," Schubert, Frieda Hempel.

"Song of India," Rimsky-Korsakoff; "The Night Wind," Farley; "Mighty Lak a Rose," Nevin; "Lauterbach," Brahms; Folk Song; "Gasaetxii," Frieda Hempel; "Orientale," Cui; Ewald Haun; "Blue Danube Waltz," Strauss; Frieda Hempel and orchestra.

The broadcasters will be WEAF, WEEI, WGR, WRC, WWJ, WSAI, WGN, WCCO, KSD, WJAR, WTAG, WCAE, WTAM, WOC and WFI. Next Sunday at the same time, Reinald Werrenrath, baritone, will be heard.

Toscha Seidel, Russian violinist, is to be the soloist tonight at 10:15 o'clock from WJZ, WRC, WGY, WBZ and KDKA in a concert with Nathaniel Shilkret's orchestra.

•.•

Walter Damrosch will direct the New York Symphony Orchestra in a concert of selections of well-known composers Saturday night, beginning at 9 o'clock, Eastern Standard Time.

The program follows: Overture, "William Tell," Rossini; "Scherzo" from "Symphony No. 5" in B flat, Glazounow; "Fire Music" from "Walküre," Wagner; "Afternoon of a Faun," Debussy; "Entrance of the Little Fauns," Pierne.

The broadcasters will be WEAF, WEEI, WFI, WCAE, WWJ, WSAI, WTAM, WGN, KSD, WCCO and WDAF.

The Boston Symphony, playing in Symphony Hall, Boston, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky will be heard through WJZ, WRC, WGY and WBZ Saturday night at 8:10 o'clock.

One of the features of the Boston Symphony concerts are the notes on the selections to be played which are given to the radio audience by Professor John P. Marshall. For five minutes preceding the first selection and again during the intermission, Professor Marshall will be heard giving this information.

Carl Schlegel, baritone, will be the soloist tomorrow night at 7 o'clock from WJZ, with Henry Hadley's twenty-piece symphony orchestra.

The program will last for one hour and will include: "Pomp and Circumstance," Elgar; "Minuet," Paderewski; vocal solo, Carl Schlegel, aria, "To the Evening Star," Wagner; "L'Invitation à la valse," Weber; "Simple Aveu," Thomé; vocal solos, Carl Schlegel, "Du Bist Wie Eine Blume," "The Two Grenadiers," Schumann; "Largo," Handel; "Dance Macabre," Saint-Saëns; vocal solos, Carl Schlegel, "All Through the Night," Old Welsh, and "Brown October Ale," De Koven; selection from the opera "Pagliacci," Leoncavallo.

A program of "Old Favorites" will be played by Nathaniel Shilkret's Orchestra and sung by a male quartet over WGY and WJZ Tuesday, beginning at 9 o'clock.

Grace Hamilton Morrey, pianist, and Jacques Jacobs, violinist, supported by a string quartet, will broadcast a joint recital Friday night at 10 o'clock from WJZ and WGY.

The program will be divided into three parts, the first composed of violin solos and the second devoted to piano solos. The concluding part will be the "Kaiser Quartet," by Haydn, played by the string quartet.

Leoncavallo's opera, "Pagliacci," will be presented by the WGN vocal group Saturday night at 10 o'clock, Eastern Standard Time. The opera will be "tabloided" so that all of the important music can be brought in. Narrative bits will be told by the announcer.

•.•

The radio travelogue of WRC, WGY and WJZ at 10 o'clock on Tuesday evening will take the listeners to Madrid, Spain. A special Spanish orchestra will furnish an appropriate musical background for the trip. Next week the broadcast at this hour will deal with Amsterdam, the capital of the Netherlands.

Times Wide World Photos.

Mary Garden, Soprano, and Will Rogers, Comedian, Who Will Be Heard on the Radio Over WEAF, WJZ and Affiliated Stations Tomorrow Between 8 and 12 P. M. Frieda Hempel, Soprano, Formerly of the Metropolitan Opera Company, Will Sing Over WEAF'S Network Tonight in a Recital Beginning at 9:15 o'Clock.

EVENTS SCHEDULED FOR BROADCASTING

Biblical Presentations of "The Trial Before Pilate" and "The Death of Judas" Will Be Heard Over WEAF Today—Shakespeare's "Macbeth" on the Air Tonight

A BIBLICAL presentation, "The Trial of Jesus Christ Before Pilot" and "The Death of Judas," from an especially prepared passion play by A. Winfield Hoeny, will be played before the microphone of Station WEAF tonight beginning at 6 o'clock and continuing until 6:30.

The scenes from which this particular play is based were prepared in manuscript form by Dr. Peyton H. Hoge of Louisville, Ky.; Dr. John Sampey, noted Hebrew teacher; Dr. A. Dosker of Chicago and Henry C. Van Dyke of Princeton.

The actors have been chosen for their voice personalities and great care has been taken to select voices characteristic of the parts they will play. The voice of Pedro de Cordoba will be heard as Christ; Charles Webster will play the part of Pilate; A. Winfield, Hoeny, Jndas, and Henry Butler will play Caiaphas. An appropriate musical background will be sent into the microphone to create atmosphere for the presentations.

Shakespeare's "Macbeth," with Pedro de Cordoba as "Macbeth" and Katherine Emmet as Lady Macbeth, will be presented by the WEAF players tonight at 10:15 o'clock. Other principal rôles to be taken during this production will be as follows: Macduff, Lawrence Cecil; Duncan, Gerald Stopp, and Banquo, Alfred Shirley. WCAE and WEAF will do the broadcasting.

•.•

The Park Avenue Baptist Church carillon will usher in the program of WJZ at 7 o'clock tonight. The bells, of which there are fifty-nine, range in size from ten pounds to nine tons, are played from a keyboard similar to that of a piano and require no more exertion to play than that instrument.

•.•

The WEAF Musical Comedy Tronpe will present another offering of "hits and bits" from musical comedies of by-gone and present days for the audience of WEAF at 8 o'clock Saturday night.

•.•

Ignaz Friedman, Polish pianist, will be the feature artist of the program to be broadcast Tuesday night at 9 o'clock, Eastern Standard Time, over WEAF'e network. The program will include Rondo, A minor, Mozart; "Rondo Favori," Hummel; "Minute Waltz," Chopin; Ballade, A flat, Chopin; "Butterfly Etude," Chopin; "Viennese Dance," Friedman-Gaertner; "Campanello," by Liszt.

An orchestra under the direction of Max Jacobs will also assist in this recital through WEAF, WEEI, WFI, WCAE, WGR, WWJ, WOC, WCCO, KSD, WJAR, WTAG, WGN, WTAM, WSAI and WRC.

During the hours between 8 and 9 o'clock Tuesday night, at WRNY, a string ensemble will broadcast selections so arranged as to depict phases of the elements in music.

The broadcast will consist of: Overture, "William Tell," Gioachino Rossini; "Scenes Poetique," Benjamin Godard. "In the Woods," "On the Mountain"; "Imploration à Neptune," Jules Massenet; "Ocean," Tremisot; "To Spring," Eduard Grieg; "Autumn and Winter," Alexander Glazounov.

"Stormy Evening at Sea," "Peer Gynt," Eduard Grieg; "Storm Clouds," Stahlberg; "Carnival des Animaux," Camille Saint-Saëns: "The Elephant," "The Swan."

The second program, based upon an important incident in American history, will be sent out on WEAF's wave Tuesday evening at 7:30 o'clock. The Lewis and Clark expedition will be the basis of this entertainment.

•.•

"Selections That Never Die" will be broadcast by the Anglo-Persian Orchestra Friday night at 10 o'clock, Eastern Standard Time, from WEAF, WRC, WJAR, WTAM, KSD, WWJ, WCCO, WDAF, WGR, WEEI, WTAG, WCAE, WOC and WLIT.

HARVARD-YALE GAME BOOKED FOR WEAF-WJZ

A PLAY-BY-PLAY description of the Harvard-Yale football game on Saturday will be broadcast by WEAF and WJZ, WRC, WGY, WBZ direct from the Yale Bowl, New Haven, beginning at 1:45 o'clock.

The Illinois Ohio State game on Saturday will be radiated by WGN, Chicago, direct from the Memorial Stadium at Champaign, Ill.

The Army-Navy game on Nov. 27 at Soldiers Field, Chicago, will be broadcast by WEAF and WGN.

Station WJZ expects to broadcast a football game on Thanksgiving Day, but the game has not been selected as yet.

FREE MEDICAL ADVICE BY RADIO AT SEA

THE free medical radio service inaugurated by the United Fruit Company some time ago from its hospitals in the various countries of Central America and from the passenger ships in its service is now available to all ships at sea, through an additional number of stations, which include WBF, Boston; WAX, Miami; WNU, New Orleans; WBW, Burrwood, La.; WIO and WNN, at Fort Morgan and Mobile, Ala., respectively, and about nine stations in Central America. All passenger ships of the United Fruit Company carry doctors, and free medical service may henceforth be secured by radio from any of them by addressing a radiogram to the ship's doctor, followed by the name of the steamship.

It is explained that this free medical service is maintained by ships at sea which do not carry physicians. Should occasion require, however, the doctors of other ships may hold consultation by radio with the United Fruit Company's hospital staffs or with doctors on steamships in its service.

Radiograms requesting medical advice should be signed by the Captain of the ship and should state briefly but clearly the symptoms of the person afflicted. Such radiograms will be given preference over all others, excepting S O S calls, throughout the service of the Tropical Radio Company and the United Fruit Company.

BAFFLE BOARD TENDS TO IMPROVE SPEAKER

THE tone quality of the average cone-type speaker may be considerably improved by simply mounting it behind a hole in a board, according to C. W. Peterson, acoustic engineer. The board, or "baffle," serves to accentuate the low tones usually lost in radio reproduction.

For a baffle he uses a square board measuring about four feet on each edge or a round board of equal diameter. A hole is cut in the centre of this board the size of a speaker cone. The speaker is then mounted on the back of the baffle, so that the point of its cone extends through the hole, and the whole unit is hung near a wall.

The result of this arrangement is that low notes of organ music and of orchestras or instrumental solos are brought out with surprising clarity. The tone quality is more mellow, full and pleasing than can be obtained with any ordinary loud speaker. Music sounds more natural, and static and other high-pitched noises are reduced.

"The radio fan who wants to try this scheme with his cone-type speaker can do so with very little trouble," said Mr. Peterson. "It is merely necessary for him to get a board of the proper size, cut a hole in it the size of the speaker, and mount the speaker on this board so that it lines up with the hole. It is usually possible to remove the base of the speaker so that it can be mounted easily. The front of the board may be covered with tapestry or decorated so that it presents a pleasing appearance, and then the assembly may be hung in a corner of the room or any other convenient place."

WORLD-WIDE SURVEY REVEALS PECULIARITIES OF SHORT WAVES

Transmission Tests by WGY Engineers Extending Over Eighteen Months and Observed Around Earth Solve Many Ether Secrets

A STATISTICAL staff at station WGY has just completed the tabulation of thousands of reports regarding transmissions on a variety of wave lengths extending over a period of eighteen months, during which time trained observers in all parts of the world made a record of the reception.

A small percentage of the total reports dealt with the 15-meter wave transmissions. On this wave no reports were received regarding daylight reception within a radius of 900 miles, indicating an apparent skip distance of this magnitude, that is, the signals were projected into the sky but were not reflected back to earth until that had traveled 900 miles. At night the skip distance of the 15-meter waves was 1,000 miles.

About 900 observations were made on the 26.38 meter transmission. These indicated a day skip of 100 miles, which at night increased to 450 miles. These limits, however, are not sharply defined, varying considerably from day to day. Although the signal characteristics beyond the limits of the day and night skips were not as erratic as those on 15 meters, the reliability was low at a distance of 3,000 miles. Beyond the region of uncertainty, the signal became more reliable and more consistent in its behavior.

It was noted that at 2,650 miles the night signal audibility is low, which might lead to the erroneous conclusion that the useful range was not greater than 3,000 miles, according to engineers. As a matter of fact, reports from observers in New England and Australia indicated better reception than that at most points in the United States.

The great popularity of the 32.77 transmission was largely due to the fact that previous to the tests it had become well known through broadcasting of the WGY programs. Fifty per cent of all reports received were on this station (2XAF). These reports contained about 5,000 observations. Analysis showed the day skip distance to be 100 miles. As was observed on the higher frequencies, this distance increased at night, becoming 400 miles.

The limit of the day range for this transmitter could not be established definitely, due to insufficient reports beyond 2,650 miles. Reports on the night transmission were received from all parts of the world, indicating fairly consistent high average strength for the maximum distance obtainable, i. e., one half of the earth's circumference.

The day and night audibility characteristics of 50.2-meter transmissions indicate that no skip distance existed at this frequency. The useful day range of this transmission was definitely shown to be 1,100 miles. The curve of night audibility indicates that at 2,650 miles the signal strength was still good. The analysis showed that reports from distances greater than 2,100 miles were so erratic as to make it impossible to determine the absolute useful limit of the night transmission.

The attenuation of the day signal of 65.5-meter transmission was not great. At 1,050 miles the strength was fairly high, indicating that satisfactory reception might be had for 200 or 300 miles further. Actually, this was not true, because fading, static and other factors which prove detrimental to good reception, caused the signal to become unreliable at points further than 1,000 miles from the transmitter. The night audibility curve shows only slight attenuation at all distances to 2,650 miles. Again, erratic reports make it impossible to accurately fix the limit of the night range. Accordingly, the region beyond 1,000 miles must be considered as an unreliable zone.

The 109-meter waves behaved more in conformity with those of the broadcast and commercial channels than did any of the other frequencies used during the test. Day and night audibilities were quite rapidly attenuated, the former reaching a lower useful limit at 400 miles, while the latter was sufficient to furnish a satisfactory signal for 1,000 miles.

The banquet of the New York State Chamber of Commerce at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel Thursday night at 9 o'clock will be broadcast by WNYC. Among the speakers scheduled are William L. De Bost, Edwin T. Meredith, William Green and Senator Hiram Bingham.

HALF OF NEW YORK RADIO SHOPS MAINTAIN SERVICE DEPARTMENTS

A SURVEY conducted by the New York University Bureau of Business Research reveals that approximately half of the New York dealers maintain service departments in connection with radio. The majority of the dealers were credited as giving free service.

In New York those dealers who charge for servicing, according to the New York University survey, do so at the following rates: Per hour, $2.50, by 25 per cent. of the dealers interviewed; $2.50 per visit by 25 per cent.; $1.50 per hour by 12½ per cent.; flat, $2 per visit, by 12½ per cent.; $10 per year service charge by 12½ per cent.; variable charges by 12½ per cent of the dealers who charged for service.

Special investigation into actual operation of service charges in other sections of the country brought to light that many dealers are operating on a flat service fee of from $10 to $20 per year. A Radio Service in Elmira, N. Y., for example, charges $1.25 per month to call each month at the customer's home, give the installation a thorough inspection, take care that water is in the battery, test the tubes and, in general, see that everything about the installation is in perfect working condition. Dealers report that there is resultant business in batteries and tubes out of the service calls.

Commenting on this, R. M. Klein, general manager of Fada Radio, said: "We believe the trade would be greatly benefited if the number of dealers able to render service were increased to 100 per cent., and it will also be found that service in most cases justifies a reasonable charge. Starting with the receiver from the time it leaves the factory and continuing for a reasonable period after it is in the hands of the ultimate purchaser, a good point to take up in any service charge discussions is where factory defects leave off. Such defects ought not to be made the subject of service charges. Yet there is a limit even here, for certainly no one will be bold enough to sustain the argument that sets ought to be free-serviced after, say, a year's use, on complaint of alleged factory defect.

It is pointed out that only 10 per cent. of service calls are directly due to defects in receivers, as learned from an analysis of New York and Chicago service calls, based on reports of dealers. Service men report that batteries, tubes, connections, poor or corroded ground and ground antenna account for a good deal of receiver difficulties; in fact, these factors are said to account for as much as 90 per cent. of all service calls.

"The question is: Can you charge for service along these lines? We believe, to a large extent, yes, provided that such service is taken into consideration before the installation and not after," said Mr. Klein.

"When an installation is made, do you take into consideration the need of proper antenna, of good contact to ground? A correct installation will reduce the calls along that line to zero. Battery and tube trouble will probably always occur.

"To sum it all up, the dealer should be out selling the service business, because there is a lot of it that will not just come into the store. Indeed, profitable business is built by service."

WOK ON TWO WAVES.

Station WOK, Homewood, Ill., is transmitting on two wave lengths. During the early part of the evening, they operate on 217 meters, then later on change over to 238 meters, which is used during the early part of the evening by WHT.

The use of the 238-meter band by WOK is with the full knowledge of the Department of Commerce, they having formerly suggested that WOK use this wave when a new transmitter was installed, according to officials of the station.

SOUVENIR FOR QUEEN.

As a souvenir of her first scheduled radio talk in this country, Queen Marie will be presented by WGR at Buffalo with a bound volume containing all the letters sent to the station about her by listeners.

TEN NEW LICENSES RAISE NUMBER OF STATIONS TO 600

WITH ten new broadcasters crowding into the already badly congested ether lanes, a new record has been established, inasmuch as the stations licensed to go on the air now exceeds 600. The Government announces the following new stations: WARS, Amateur Radio Broadcasting Company, Brooklyn, N. Y., 360 meters; WKBZ, Karl L. Ashbacker, Ludington, Mich., 256.3 meters; KRAC, Caddo Radio Club, Shreveport, La., 220 meters; WKBW, Buffalo Evangelistic Association, Inc., Buffalo, N. Y., 362.5 meters; KLRD, Dallas Radio Laboratories, Inc., Dallas, Texas, 357.1 meters; KGBY, Fernwood Quick, Danville, Ill., portable station, 220 meters; KGHA, Home Auto Company, Dell Rapids, S. D., 254.1 meters; WOAO, Huntington Broadcasters' Association, Huntington, Ind., 241.8 meters; KRSG, Radio Sales Corporation, Seattle, Wash., 499.7 meters, and WCGU, Charles G. Unger, Lakewood, N. J., 350.6 meters.

Other changes announced are: WJBT, Electric Construction Company, Gadsden, Ala., wave length changed from 270.1 to 260 meters; KGEF, First Baptist Church, New Orleans, La., call letters changed from KGU; WDHE, Gilham Electric Company, Inc., Atlanta, Ga., name changed from Gilham Schoen Electric Company, Inc.; KGTT, Glad Tidings Temple and Bible Institute, San Francisco, wave lengths changed from Glad Tidings Tabernacle, Ind.; KDYL, Intermountain Broadcasting Corporation, Salt Lake City, Utah, name changed from Utah Hotel; KNRC, Clarence B. Moore, Santa Monica, Cal., location changed from Los Angeles, Cal., wave length changed from 208.2 to 239 meters; KFEC, Meier & Frank Company, Portland, Ore., wave length changed from 247.8 to 252 meters; KGCG, Moore Motor Company, Newark, Ark., wave length changed from 234.2 to 239.9 meters; KGW, Oregonian Publishing Company, Portland, Ore., name changed from Morning Oregonian; and KFUT, University of Utah, Salt Lake City, Utah, wave length changed from 260.7 to 263 meters.

HEARING THINGS.

Those within the range of WRC at Washington, D. C., have been much puzzled recently at some of the curious music emanating from that station. What they really have been hearing has been an assortment of ancient phonograph records, inasmuch as Radio Supervisor S. W. Edwards of Detroit has been making Government field intensity tests, which have required the continuous operation of the station from morning until night.

Shielded and Protected — Against Powerful Interference!

Licensed under applications for patents of Radio Frequency Laboratories, Inc. (R. F. L.)

Dominant, Invincible, aggressive—Kellogg Radio!

Heavily shielded and protected for defense—armed with exclusive electrical advances to break through on the offense. A Kellogg set is designed from 29 years of engineering experience—is built by skilled master builders of precision telephone equipment—is right now the closest approach to perfection yet developed!

Kellogg broke away from accepted practice in search of a sharp tuning, powerful receiver, and, in this model, three stages of Inductively Tuned radio frequency work at highest efficiency and equally at all wave lengths. Tuning has been remarkably simplified, as four circuits are controlled by one knob and stations are widely separated.

Powerful! Yet a musical instrument that reproduces, with delicate precision, every note in the musical register. This 6-tube receiver in a handsome, dignified walnut cabinet is Model 507. Console Model 508 includes, also, a new and wonderful speaker which gives to radio reproduction a realism far beyond your highest expectations. Any Kellogg dealer will be glad to explain and demonstrate these advanced receivers to you.

SIR OLIVER LODGE INVENTS RECEIVER FREE OF HOWLS

New "N" Circuit Designed Not to Act as Miniature Transmitter—Only One Connection Between Antenna and Detector

MUCH interest has been displayed in England by the introduction of a new circuit, the début of which was synchronized with the opening of the radio season. This circuit is associated with the name of Sir Oliver Lodge, and consequently his claims for this circuit, which he calls the "N" circuit, carry considerable weight.

"In designing the receiver which has now become known as the N circuit my object was first to provide a wireless set that would not oscillate or cause interference with neighboring sets (and this is very necessary if we are all to enjoy the broadcasting, just as traffic control on the roads is necessary if we are to have safety); secondly, to provide a set which would be perfectly simple to operate and yet would receive programs from the local stations as well as the distant stations," said Sir Oliver Lodge.

"If the 'N' circuit were universally adopted there would be an end to the oscillation nuisance."

From this short statement it will be seen that the scientist's prime object has been to eliminate the "blooper." Regenerative circuits because of their excellent amplification have always been popular, but their use has been coupled with the "howling" nuisance.

The fundamental principle of the "N" circuit is the employment of a single connection between the antenna and detector tube. It is nothing more or less than a closed oscillating circuit. The antenna circuit itself need not be a tuned circuit, but can be of the aperiodic type and is heavily damped. The "N" circuit has a very low resistance, so that comparatively high voltages can be generated by small voltage impulses.

Sir Oliver Lodge maintains that for good quality of reproduction there should not be more than one tuned circuit, as, if two tuned circuits be employed, there is a great liability to distortion owing to heterodyning between the circuits.

In the "N" circuit the coil is made of a fairly high inductance value and the capacity of the condenser small. Owing to the much greater length of the antenna system, and to its damping, it is impossible for radiation from the antenna to occur.

The ground is also connected to the plate of the detector tube, and there is a small resistance between the grid and the filament circuit.

Methods of Stabilization.

"Successful operation of a modern radio set depends upon the elimination, or control, of the natural feed-back from the output of the radio frequency amplifier tubes to the input of these tubes," said R. H. Manson, chief engineer of the Stromberg-Carlson Telephone Manufacturing Company. "Without some adequate means for overcoming this troublesome feed-back a receiver will squeal and howl, disturbing the listeners, and what is worse, radiating this disturbance so as to affect a whole neighborhood. Even if this feed-back is kept down just below the squealing stage and not substantially eliminated, there will be distortion in the amplification that will impair the tonal quality of the reproduced signal, due to cutting down the width of the audio-frequency band.

"Today there are many schemes directed to either the control of the amount of the feed-back or to the neutralization of this feed-back. In general, these various stabilizing schemes may be divided into three main groups: Stabilization by means of losses, by adjusting amplification, or by balancing or neutralization," said Mr. Manson.

"A popular method for stabilizing contemplates some form of balancing or neutralizing the feed-back that is inherent in the radio amplifying tube, due to the capacity between the plate and grid elements. The early attempts to do this job were directed to neutralizing at one definite frequency, and were deficient when applied to the modern radio receiver, which includes a wide band of frequencies (wave lengths). The present-day neutralizing methods either completely balance out the effect of feed-back or give partial neutralization, allowing a certain amount of regeneration for the advantages that are gained through increased amplification and increased selectivity. As stated before, such a procedure has many objections, chief of which is impaired audio quality.

"Thus, for best quality of reproduction, the tuned radio frequency stages should be perfectly neutralized for all wave-length settings of the station selectors. Under these conditions and with modern shielding of the radio stages there is no possibility that oscillations will be caused in the tuned radio frequency stages that can reach the antenna and radiate to neighboring radio receivers.

"With correctly designed and balanced stages and careful application of shielding, the third method of stabilization gives the maximum amplication that can be expected per stage without the impairment of tonal quality that usually is present when regeneration is employed."

BATTERY TROUBLES.

OVERCHARGING of storage batteries produces excessive gassing and increases the temperature and in general may prove injurious to the batteries, according to George W. Vinal, of the Bureau of Standards.

"Some cases of buckling of the plates are to be attributed to overcharging, although this is by no means the only cause of buckling of the plates. Occasional overcharging is beneficial, but habitual overcharge decreases the period of useful service which the battery can give. On the other hand, consistent undercharging results in a gradual running down of the cells. Likewise insufficient charging is also one of the most common causes of buckling of the plates," said Mr. Vinal.

"Corroded terminals on storage batteries are a hindrance to the passage of the normal amount of current and cracked or broken jars invite the addition of water, which weakens the cell capacity. Impurities in the cells may be eliminated by pouring out the electrolyte and flushing the cells with distilled water. Corrosion of the grid, the reversal of the negative and positive plates, the growth of positive plates, the shrinkage of negatives, and explosions, are the main sources of battery trouble."

TRADE NOTES AND COMMENT

CURRENT for lighting the tubes in a receiver direct from the house lighting system is made possible with the "A" Transifier, a new development of the Kodel Radio Corporation. The device consumes current only when the set is in operation, supplying either 2, 4 or 6 volt current up to eight 201-A tubes or their equivalent, consuming not more than 2¼ amperes.

A built-in automatic switch controls both "A" and "B" power units when the set is in operation. The cost of maintaining this unit is estimated to be less than one-half cent per hour, and contains nothing requiring replacement other than a single standard 2½-ampere charging bulb.

The Kodel "B" Transifier is made in two models. The Model 10, designed for receivers using ten tubes or less, operating directly from the light socket, eliminating both "B" and "C" batteries. It supplies 60 milliamperes at 45, 67½, 90 and 150 volts, and furnishes 4 and 12 volt "C" battery current. The Model 61 is designed for six tube and smaller sets requiring 24 to 45 volts for detector and a maximum of 90 to 100 volts on the amplifier.

Both models of the "B" Transifier employ a standard Cunningham UX-313 full wave bulb for rectification. The units are enclosed in a pressed steel case of dark maroon and fitted with nickel-plated handles.

A new six-story addition to the plant of the Crosley Radio Corporation, Cincinnati, Ohio, has been completed. The new building adjoins the main plant and is equipped with modern manufacturing appliances for mass production, giving the corporation an additional 12,000 square feet of factory space. A woodworking plant about a mile away from this new building is used for making cabinets to house the sets that are produced in the Crosley plant. Five years ago Crosley radios were made in the corner of an automobile accessory factory.

The development of the new Raytheon rectifier tube now makes it possible to obtain "A," "B" and "C" voltage direct from the alternating current house lighting mains, according to engineers of the Raytheon Manufacturing Company. Using this tube, it is possible to obtain sufficient current and voltage to light the filaments of the 199 type vacum tubes in series, and at the same time supply sufficient plate voltage to operate a power amplifier. There still remains a reserve power from which the radio set may draw at momentary overloads, without fear of burning out the rectifying tube or impairing the tone quality.

The power transformer is built to supply 350 volts on each side of the high voltage secondary winding at no load. This is a special transformer which is now being manufactured by several companies for this purpose. This transformer also has a filament supply winding which delivers 5 volts at one-half ampere for the filament of a UX-112 or a UX-171 power amplifier tube

An extra high voltage capacity has been incorporated in the latest model Farrand "B" Eliminator. With an output of 75 milliamperes it will operate a multiple tube set, giving the following voltage: 15 to 70 on detector, 60 to 100 volts on the radio frequency tubes, and 135 to 200 volts on the last audio stage. One rectifying tube is employed, either a UX-213 or a UX-313, operating on 60-cycle AC current.

100,000 RADIO FANS OWN SETS IN AUSTRALIA

The number of receiving sets in Australia has increased 100 per cent. during the past year. Listeners there must have a Government license, and already their number has considerably exceeded 100,000.

So essential are the radio programs now considered that an auxiliary plant driven by internal combustion engines is now being installed at 2FC, one of the principal stations, so that there may be no delay in case of a breakdown. A new 5,000-watt sation, 2BL, has been inaugurated at Sydney,

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

By ORRIN E. DUNLAP Jr.

QUESTION—I have an Atwater Kent, Model 20, dry cell, compact. I cannot complain about its work, but I would like to get longer distance and more volume. At present and on the loud-speaker I get all the stations in Chicago; last night I had Oklahoma as it signed off. I am using five tubes UV-199, six "A" batteries and two double duty "B" and a 5-volt "C." I tried battery eliminators of all kinds, but I get better volume with my dry cells. I have never tried a wet cell. Here are the questions: What must I do to be able to use a power tube, and which is the best kind for me and what changes must I make in the selection of the batteries? Must I get a wet cell "A" battery? Do not leave anything to me, because I know nothing whatever about a radio. I am willing to follow whatever instructions you give me. I wrote the factory about this some time ago and they wrote back to say I should send the whole set to Philadelphia. However, I do not want to do that, because I do not want to miss the air rumpus a single night. (2) Can anything be done to increase the selectivity of this set? When WNJ is on I cannot get anything on Manhattan within a wave length of 50 meters around 350.—G. V. H. Answer—The power tube for use with a dry battery circuit is the UX-120 or equivalent tube. The total "B" battery voltage on the set should be 135 volts. A "C" battery of 22½ volts is required with the UX-120. The "A" battery remains the same. You could use a 4-volt storage battery in place of the dry cells for filament operation; however, it is not necessary. An adapter can be purchased which fits into the last socket of the audio amplifier unit. The UX-120 fits in this adapter, and extra connections are provided on some of these adapters so that the extra battery connections (extra 45 "B" and 22½-volt "C") can be linked into the circuit without disturbing the wiring of the set. (2) A short antenna improves selectivity. A wave trap might help, but you will have to determine its usefulness by experiment, because the results differ, depending upon the location and the receiver itself.

Question—I am out in the country far from any radio expert, if there is one in the Republic of Mexico. I have an eight-tube superheterodyne of the second harmonic principle. I can hear San Francisco and Los Angeles occasionally, most of the Texas stations, Chicago, Denver and Pittsburgh from time to time, New York very seldom and weak. I understand that an aerial can be used with this set to increase audibility enormously. (2) Is there any device which will eliminate static? (3) How long should the batteries and tubes last in this set. (4) Evidently the set is provided with connections for a special volt-ampere meter. Can you tell me the name and address of the manufacturer?—C. S. Answer—Place a wave trap close alongside the loop or on the lower part of the frame. Connect one terminal of the trap to an outdoor antenna about 100 feet long, including the lead-in. Connect the other terminal of the trap to the ground (radiator or cold-water pipe). Then tune the set as usual and then tune the wave trap until the signal is loudest. There is no direct connection between the wave trap and the set or the loop. Energy picked up by the antenna is transferred from the trap to the loop by induction. This method can be used on any set equipped with an external loop by placing the wave trap alongside the loop or by winding the lead-in from the outside antenna around the loop once or twice. However, more selective tuning can be obtained when the wave trap is employed. (2) No. (3) Good "A" batteries used two and a half hours a day should last about three and a half months. The life of the "B" battery depends upon its size and the number of hours used. It also varies with different types of batteries. The "C" battery will last from six to ten months, as there is no drain on it. The tubes will last at least 1,000 hours if properly operated. (4) This device is a Weston meter manufactured by the Weston Electrical Instrument Company, 50 Church Street, New York.

Question—Can you tell me the call letter of a broadcasting station on the island of Haiti? It was on the air Nov. 5 between 8 and 9 o'clock on a wave length of 361 meters. The announcer spoke first in English and repeated in French. I got the wave length as he gave it and his description of the island, which I located by his referring to the inhabitants as Dominicans. The call seemed like KK or KA. The music came in as loud as a New York station here in New Haven.—A. S. H. Answer—Station HHK at Port au Prince, Haiti, operating on 361.2 meters. It is a new station, on the air about a month.

Question—When operating my set on short waves with an antenna and ground no extraneous noises are heard. However, when I disconnect the ground and connect in its place a wire parallel to and on a straight line with the original aerial (converting it into a Hertz antenna) I hear all the telephone conversations going through the house switchboard downstairs. The additional wire is not within fifty feet of any telephone wire, although the original aerial runs parallel with the house phone. An indoor aerial is used. (2) Can you publish a list of the short wave commercial stations and the wave lengths used? (3) What countries use the following intermediates: JM, FM, AA? (4) Where are the following stations located: Mexico, 1G; F-8-YOR, JM-2PZ, AA7, 7EK, WVA, WVZ?—B. F. Answer—The conversations are transferred by induction to the Hertz antenna or the telephone wire in the house may be near the indoor aerial at some point. (2) This list is not available because most of the stations are experimental and change their waves very often. (3) JM-Jamaica; no record of FM; the army uses AA. (4) No record of 1G; F-8OYR is in France; JM-2PZ, Jamaica, West Indies; AA7, Fort Leavenworth, Kansas; 7EK, Tacoma, Wash.; WVA, Washington, D. C.; WVZ, Fort Hayes, Ohio.

Question—I think I have read all your answers to questions concerning the use of the UX-200-A detector, but I haven't seen either in THE TIMES or elsewhere anything that covers my trouble. My set has two stages of neutralized radio frequency, detector, and three stages of resistance coupled audio frequency, the latter Daven couplers with .006 condensers. I use 201-As in the radio frequency and two Daven Mu-20s and a Mu-6 in the audio frequency stages. I have a .005 condenser across the output. The Bradley leak is connected to negative side of filament. Speaker is Western Electric cone. Two jacks, one on four tubes, other on all. With either a 201-A or 200 for detector I get fine quality and distance. With the 200-A the results are O. K. with the head phones on four tubes, but with the speaker on six—Wow! Nothing but a series of intermittent raucous noises worthy of the proverbial lost soul. It is not a squeal nor a howl. More like a file across the edge of sheet iron. Will appreciate it if you can diagnose and prescribe the remedy.—W. H. M. Answer—Evidently with the increased signal strength afforded by the UX-200-A the amplification is increased to such an extent that it sets up oscillation in the amplifier unit. This is undoubtedly the trouble, but it would be a good plan to test the tube in another set to determine if it is O. K.

Question—I have a Radiola 25. Can I use tubes other than the UX-199 and UX-120?—D. D. Answer—Yes, any three-volt tube can be used.

STATION 2LO, LONDON, HAS AN ECHO ROOM

ENGINEERS at station 2LO, London, have built a special room which they call the "echo room," which has no draperies or any objects likely to act as impediments to the natural echo.

A loud-speaker designed to give as perfect reproduction as possible is located in this room and a microphone re-collects the transmission, which is conducted back to the control room to join the original output from the studio.

The artificial echo is imposed on dance music, orchestra work, octets, ballad concerts and opera, but never on speech.

It is now possible to produce almost any desired effect by changing the number or positions of the amplifiers and microphones.

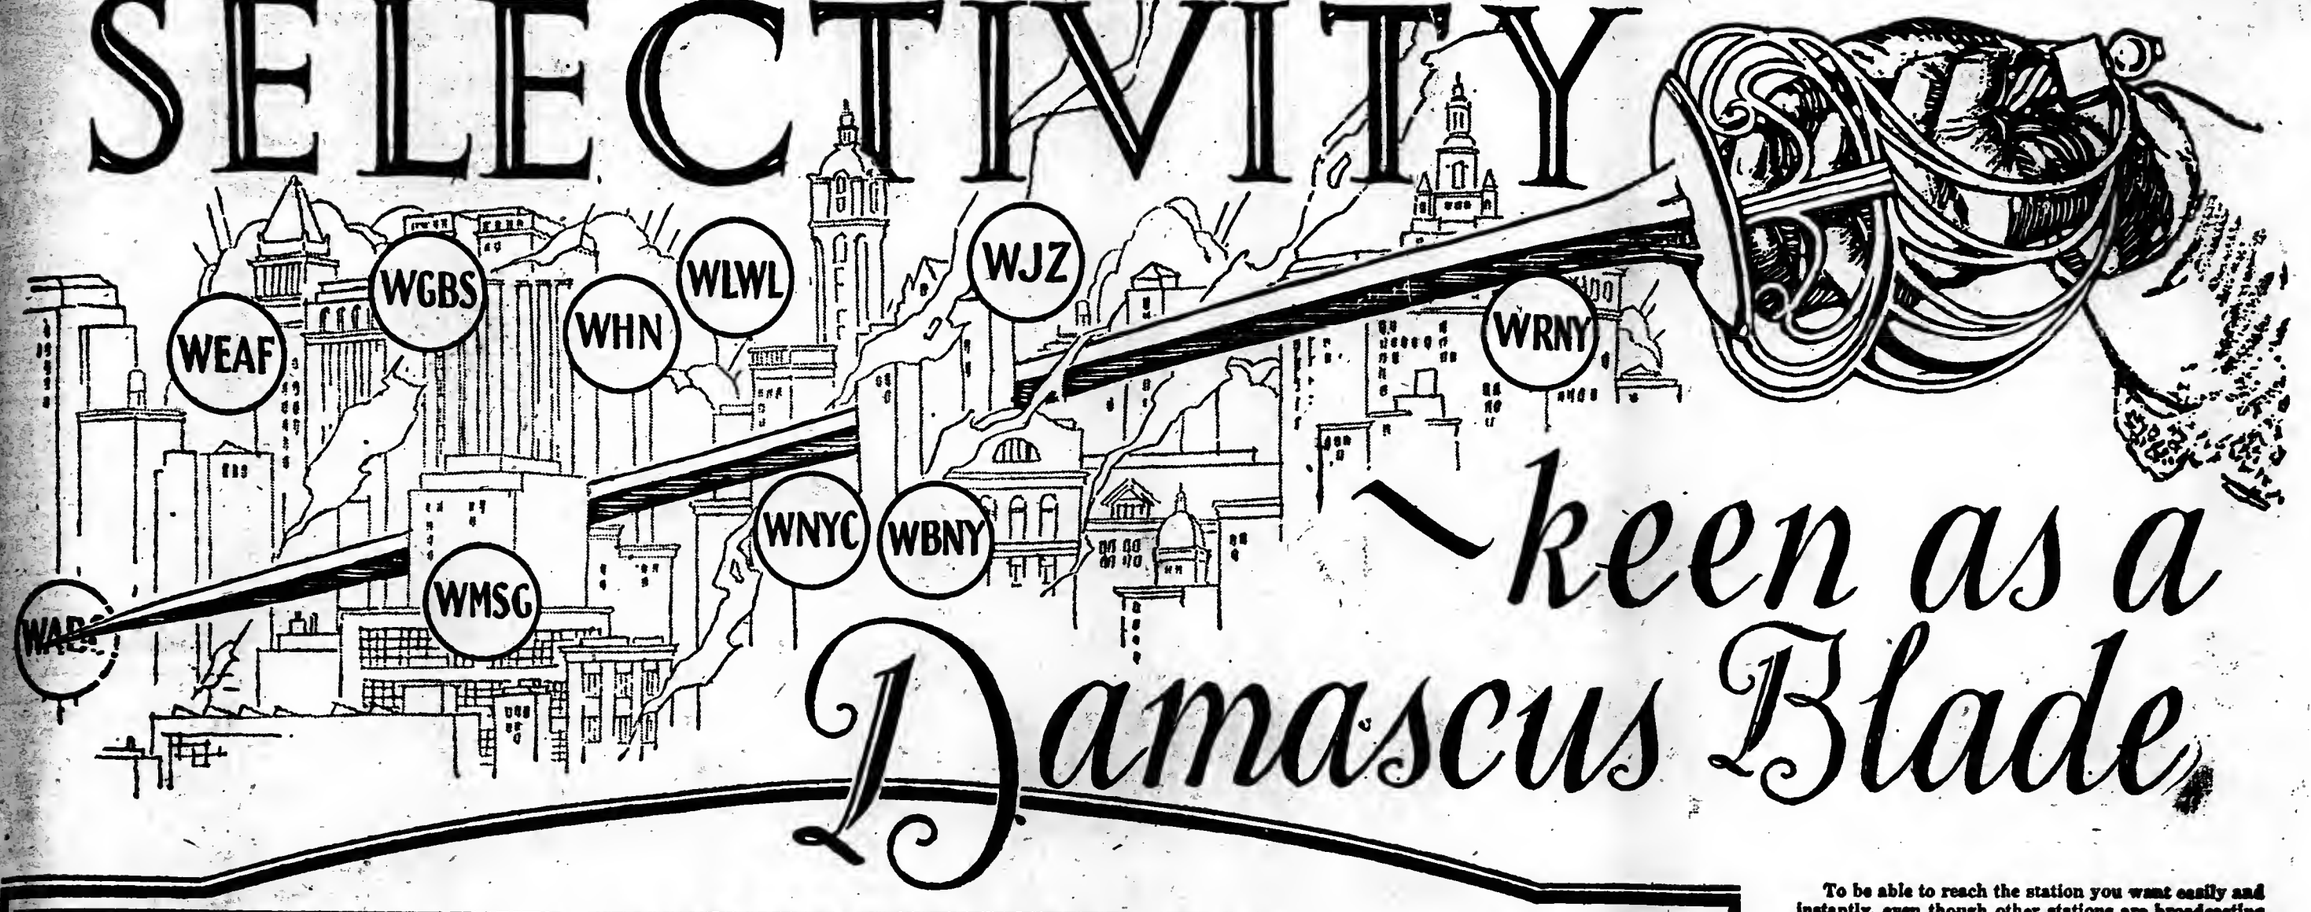
SELECTIVITY



~keen as a Damascus Blade.

To be able to reach the station you want easily and instantly, even though other stations are broadcasting close by—to separate stations whose wave lengths are nearly the same—that helps immensely in the real enjoyment of radio.

You can do this with Stromberg-Carlson 5-tube receivers. The knife-like selectivity of these Receivers lets you cut interference to a minimum and tune in sharply on the station you want, even though there are other stations broadcasting on nearby wave lengths.

Stromberg-Carlson 5-tube Receivers obtain their remarkable selectivity, first, by totally shielding each coil and, second, by a vernier adjustment on one of the condensers.

The shielding completely and scientifically encloses each coil. This prevents local pick-up of unwanted signals or other interference by the coils. No signal can enter these Stromberg-Carlsons except through the antenna and then only those signals may enter to which the antenna is tuned.

And this same shielding so essential to selectivity is a vital factor in giving that excellence of tone with distance range and volume which characterizes every Stromberg-Carlson Receiver. For shielding, scientifically designed to accomplish definite electrical purposes—the prevention of inter-stage coupling—permits accurate building up of the powerful currents necessary to true reproduction of every note in the musical scale.

TREATMENT FOR RECEIVERS OUTLINED IN FIRST-AID RULES

Engineers Give Hints to Help Radio Set Owners Locate Sources of Trouble and Make Repairs —Symptoms of Failure and Cures

PROXIMITY of steel buildings, power lines, trolley and railway lines, and the geological and topographical conditions surrounding the installation are all important factors among the general causes why radio sets fail to function properly, according to Lee Manley and W. E. Garity, in an address delivered at a meeting of the Institute of Radio Engineers.

"What we will attempt is to outline a first-aid manual for the treatment of 'sick' radio sets that will enable the man who has only a slight knowledge of radio to recognize the trouble and make the necessary repairs. Sets as a rule do not go bad of themselves. The failure usually occurs while some operation is taking place, such as plugging in the loud-speaker, turning the condensers or making a change in the battery connections," said the engineers.

"If the set has been in operation for a month or six weeks and has been giving satisfactory service for that period, the cause of failure is generally due to the weakening of the batteries.

"If the set has been in operation for a period of six months or a year the possibilities of trouble will increase. If the failure in this type of installation has been gradual, the first thought would be that the tubes were becoming deactivated through continual use.

Mechanical Failures.

"If the breakdown was sudden, a mechanical failure might be expected in one of the movable connections or pigtails. A burned-out transformer could be expected in difficulties of this sort. If the trouble is due to a noise condition, the failure might be ascribed to dust or dirt accumulations on the condenser plates or other important parts of the receiver. The defect might also be due to a soldered connection. It will require, as a rule, a rather long period of time for a soldered connection to corrode to such a degree as to cause this condition. The local atmospheric conditions under which the set has been operating may have some bearing on the cause of failure. If the set has been operating near the seashore and has been subjected to the action of salt atmosphere it may have caused sufficient corrosion of the connections or other metallic parts to introduce high resistance or leakage path. Moisture may saturate the cheaper grades of insulating material to such an extent as to cause high-frequency short circuits.

"If a set has been operating for a long period of time and has given satisfactory results and then develops noises and scratching sounds, one should not look for a loose connection in the wiring of the set, but rather look for an open circuit in the moving parts. Worn mechanical parts are often mistaken for loose connections in the wiring. The wiring is absolutely stationary and it is not at all likely that it will be disturbed in the ordinary use of the set so as to cause a failure due to a loose connection. Vernier drive shafts and vernier plates will wear loose, and while apparently they are making perfect contact to the metal surfaces of the condenser when the set is brought into a critical condition, as is the case when receiving distant stations, will cause noises that might be thought due to a loose connection in the wiring.

"Another item to be considered is the cost of the original apparatus. Radio, like any other merchandise, is a matter of price. As a rule, the more you pay for a set the better should be the quality of the equipment you get and you may reasonably expect longer and more satisfactory service from it. In a high-grade receiver the mechanical failures are less frequent than in the cheaper grades of sets. The same is true of electrical failures. The cheaper grades of sets are much more subject to climatic conditions than are the better grades.

Method of Diagnosing.

"In general, the service men should follow a procedure somewhat along these lines. Light the tubes and tune the receiver to the point where the best local station generally is received. Note the volume of the loud-speaker, if one is used. If the volume is weak, tap the tubes with the finger nail to determine whether or not the audio-frequency amplifiers are operating satisfactorily. If the amplifier is working satisfactorily a ringing sound will be heard in the loud-speaker. If this ringing does not result, check the polarity and voltage of the batteries and replace all defective ones. Inspect the connections of the batteries, and if this does not result in satisfactory reception, try replacing the tubes.

"If no sound is audible, immediately replace the loud-speaker with the head phones to determine whether or not the loud-speaker is defective. If no results are obtained, turn off the "A" battery switch and remove the tubes and by meane of a voltmeter check the voltage between the filament and the plate contact springs of each socket. If satisfactory indications are had and no signal is heard, repeat with a similar operation between the grid and filament contacts, using a pair of head phones in series with a 22½-volt battery in place of a voltmeter. Rather decided clicks should be heard when contact is made in each instance with the exception of the detector grid. Because of the fact that in the detector circuit a high resistance grid leak is used the click will be rather weak.

"The most difficult type of failure to locate is that caused by a high-resistance connection. It is not only difficult to locate, but it is difficult to determine. This will cause the set to operate indifferently with rather unsatisfactory results. This condition is sometimes mistaken as location trouble. A high resistance is possible at any connection in the receiver. Soldered connections that are soldered with a corrosive flux that has not been properly treated after the soldering operation are probably the worst offenders. Weak mechanical springs in telephone jacks and switches may also introduce high resistance connections."

The Maurice Leest Concert Trio will broadcast a recital tonight at 9:30 o'clock from WJZ. The assisting artists in this recital will be Ellie M. Ebeling, soprano, and William Norman, pianist.

A program presented by boys and girls whose average age is sixteen will be given on harmonicas Friday night at 8:30 o'clock, Eastern Standard Time. During the latter part of the period ensemble, duet and harmonica solos will be heard, accompanied by an instrumental quartet.

The broadcasters will be WEAF, WEEI, WLIB, WGR, WRC, WCAE, WWJ and WTAM.

WATER TAPS IN TORONTO SHOP ACT AS A RADIO RECEIVER

Canadian Experts Puzzled by Music Apparently Detected by Pipes With Sink in Florist's Store Serving as Loud-Speaker

CANADIAN radio men are puzzled by the action of hot and cold water taps in a florist's shop in Toronto which act as a radio receiver, with the metal sink as loud-spcaker. Concerts and epeech broadcast from Station CFCA, whose operating room is overhead, are plainly heard through this unique receiver.

Music is received with much more volume than speech, although the latter can he heard at a distance of three feet when the epeaker is talking with less than average force into the microphone. The operator of CFCA, E. J. Bowers, reports that one evening while a concert was being broadcast by remote control the music could be heard very plainly outside the locked door of the shop, come ten feet away from the water taps.

The owner of the shop, when asked as to whether the contiouous flow of music was irksome, replied that he did not find it so, and often came to the shop at night to hear a good concert. He has listened in this manner to church services broadcast through CFCA.

"The only time that it is bothersome," he said, "is when the radio and music store across the street opens up with its loud-speaker and rebroadcasts above the noise of traffic. Then I am in between two firee."

Just what is the cause of this freak reception has not heen definitely established. Samuel J. Ellis, radio inspector for the Toronto district, has investigated with telephone engineers in an effort to solve the mystery.

"We tested every pipe near hy and in other parts of the hnilding, hut nowhere was the volume as great as at the taps. Nearby pipes would record to a slight extent when a fiddlestick was used," said Mr. Ellis.

Thie, Mr. Ellis explained, was a small wooden rod, some eighteen inches long and eimilar in appearance to an ordinary broomstick. One end had been sawed off diagonally and a small wooden disc, the size of one'e ear, nailed onto it. The other end was grooved to fit on a pipe. When the fiddlestick was placed againet a pipe and held to the ear, music and speech were audihle.

"It is either magnetism or mechanical vibration," said Mr. Ellis. "Just what it is we have not yet determined."

E. J. Bowers, operator of the broadcasting station, holds somewhat similar views. Since he explained that the station is in no way connected with the pipes, it being thoroughly grounded where necessary and the leads from the motor generator to the tubes contain more than the required number of radio freqnency chokes and by-pass condensers, it would seem that mechanical vibration is accountable for this "tap music."

The case has aroused considerable interest among Toronto radio fans. Reports from Eng and tell of a similar case in which a metal lamp pole near Station 2LO in London acts in a like manner and daily, brings crowds about it.

MORE SPEAKER VOLUME WHEN CONE FACES WALL

Tests conducted in the Engineering Laboratories of the Crosley Radio Corporation ehow that a majority of the single-cone type of loud-speakers on the market give greater sound volume to listeners directly in front of the epeaker when they are placed with the point of the cone in the direction opposite to that of the listeners than when they are placed with the point of the cone toward the listeners.

Thue fans who have placed their loud-speakers with the cone pointing away from the wall will usually find that they can slightly increase the sound volume hy turning the speaker around so that the inside of the cone points toward the listeners. This hint will be found valuable in tuning to weak signale.

Engineers explain this slight difference by the fact that the cup-shaped inside of the cone le more effective in transmitting motion to the eurrounding air than the elanting outside surface of the cone. Stronger waves are therefore eet up by the inside of the cone than hy the outside.

CLEVELAND SYMPHONY TO PLAY OVER WTAM

THE Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Nikolai Sokoloff, will broadcast a series of eight concerts during the Winter through Station WTAM, Cleveland, operating on 389 meters. The datès for the concerts are Nov. 25, Dec. 16 and 23, Jan. 13 and 27, March 3 and 31, and April 21.

Each concert will be on the air between 8 and 10 o'clock, Eastern Standard Time, on the eight specified Thursday evenings.

During the past Summer Mr. Sokoloff was a guest condnctor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

JAPANESE STATIONS UNDER ONE CONTROL

The broadcasting companies of Japan have decided to join their interests in the formation of one company which will control all broadcasting in the country, according to a report from Commercial Attaché Charles E. Herring in Tokio. A number of those who are interested in radio are of the opinion that the move was directed and guided by the Government.

ARMORED BOSCH RADIO

WITH Bosch Radio you can seek your programs at will and fit the volume to your desires, and the simplicity of tuning is amazing—a slight movement of a single dial gives you the station you want. Never before has radio been made so simple to operate and so pleasing in results.

The Cruiser, armored and shielded receiver, far exceeds any five tube set you ever heard in power, and clear tonal value. It has unified control, a single dial for most tuning, two dials for "Cruising the Air."

The seven tube Amborada in its early American period cabinet is worthy of the finest home—its cabinet holds all batteries, charger, or power unit, giving unmarred beauty. The Amborada has a single dial control—it accomplishes the most difficult reception with quickness and ease. See the new Bosch models at the nearest Bosch Radio Dealer

Rola LOUDSPEAKER

True reproduction—rich, full bass notes, clear, brilliant trebles, elimination of all false tones or muffled reverberation—that is what the ROLA Loudspeaker contributes to radio enjoyment. Hear the ROLA and you'll be startled at its superiority over any loudspeaker you have ever heard before. Table or pedestal models, beautifully finished in rubbed walnut.

Ask your dealer to demonstrate it.

Don't blame it all on static!

"STATIC" is almost invariably the excuse for imperfect radio reception. Yet, we have found that in most cases the fault is not "static" but in the radio receiver itself.

We are radio "doctors" and we guarantee to effect a permanent cure. For an exhaustive examination of your set, and a written report as to its condition, we charge $5.00.

This charge, also, includes any minor adjustments and repairs which our inspector can make. Often, all that are required.

Have your radio gone over without delay. May we send a representative to see you?

TOURISTS ENJOY WESTERN BEARS

In Yellowstone Park These Animals Are Privileged Characters and Prove More Fascinating Than Geysers

GEOGRAPHY has tanght the tourist in Yellowstone National Park to look for geysers and hot springs, but human interest has taught him to keep a sharp watch for bears. Boiling mud pots, colored pools, steaming plains enthrall; yet after a day or two, "See, a geyser!" meets with nothing like the response of "Oh, there's a bear!"

Hikers go far out of their way to pass a bear den, and riders keep their faces turned toward the woods. A party climbing down a precipitous stairway to view the majestic falls of the Yellowstone will forget the cataract—twice the height of Niagara—and watch a bear feeling its way down the opposite slope. It is not that they are figuring the best way to run for their lives. Fear is not the governing emotion. The park management requires the traveler at the entrance to put any implements harmful to animals under seal; and there, too, he voluntarily checks his fear. In the Yellowstone one naturally accepts the idea that wild life is a side show, all the more entertaining because of the absence of trainer and cage.

For a long time after the Yellowstone was established as a national park little or no attention was paid to the bears. However, about 1889, black bears commenced frequenting the dumps where garbage from the hotels and camps was piled. Soon they became such a nuisance that the park authorities considered killing them off. Later their value as a tonrist attraction evidenced itself, and by law the park became a wild animal sanctuary.

The fame of Yellowstone's "Hold-up Bear" has spread far and wide. Of his own accord, while a cub, he sat up on his haunches beside the road one day, and some one stopped and gave him something to eat. But many passed him by, and so he took the middle of the road to turn his little trick. Then automobiles had to stop. Thereafter, several of his brethren took to following his lead, and the tribe of bear "panhandlers" flourished.

There are today, it is estimated, something like 150 black bears, including brown, which belong to the same family, and forty grizzlies, in the park. They usually manage to supply every tourist with some kind of personal bear tale. The first evening he is there the visitor finds his way to the garbage pile, which is now carefully marked "Bear Dump," and waits for Old Grizzly to come out for his meal. At the Lake Hotel, even in daylight hours, a clatter may be heard in the back yard, and tourists rush to the window to behold a skinny little black bear digging like a hungry dog in the garbage can. The hotel clerk smiles at their eagerness. Blackie is an old friend.

Two campers were hiking down a main highway in the park when a black bear crossed their path in a leisurely manner and began lapping at a roadside pool. The visitors produced a vest pocket camera to take a snapshot. The bear thought he would investigate. He came up uncomfortably near, separating the pair. When the photographer closed the camera and returned it to his pocket the bear sniffed indifferently and turned away. It was supposed that Bruin had mistaken the camera for a large cake of chocolate, which all Yellowstone bears consider the greatest delicacy. It is a common experience to have a bear come up and eat out of one's hand, but the feeder is warned to turn loose before the last bite. By no means may the visitor safely presume on the acquaintance. Last year one woman enthusiast thought it would be nice to have her photograph taken embracing a bear. But the bear resented the advance, bit her hand, and she spent six weeks recovering.

Automobilists are warned to leave nothing edible in their cars, for in the night the bears stage foraging expeditions. Tourists voluntarily put up with much for the sake of amusement. Some campers returned to their tent one night only to spy a black bear inside going through their things. They watched his ludicrously systematic search and offered no interference until he elected to take himself away.

There is one big black fellow in the Yellowstone for whose capture, according to one of the bus drivers, the farmers of the neighborhood would gladly give $500. He is a canny animal, they declare, and regales himself on their melons and berries; but before they can get into action he retreats to sanctuary in the Yellowstone.

Bears are not the only animal playfellows in the park. Near one of the camps lives a woodchuck named "Minnie." When children spy her and call her by name she comes, like a cat, sits up on her haunches and nibbles at their handfuls of bread.

CHURCH JAZZ WEDDING UTILIZES SAXOPHONE

THAT the saxophone has at last received consecration along with other musical instruments is indicated by a wedding recently celebrated at All Saints' Church, Blackpool, England. The bridegroom was a member of a jazz band and the hymns were orchestrated to allow the saxophone to support the voices of the choir, which contained stage singers.

The bride carried a bouquet of red roses arranged in the form of a saxophone, and the couple emerged from the church door to pass under an arch formed by saxophones, trumpets and trombones.

The vicar of All Saints' Church apparently felt that some explanation was necessary for the departure from British musical tradition. He explained that bands in church services were not unusual; soldiers and sailors when attending church parade augment the organ and choir with their bands. Since this was already regarded as seemly and beautiful, the Rev. P. B. Thornburn said that there should be no gulf set between religion and the great profession that entertained the public.

COMMUNISTS HAVE THEIR LITTLE JOKE

DURING the clashes between the ruling faction in the Russian Communist Party and the opposition group members of the latter sometimes point out that their position is supported by Nadezhda Konstantinona Krupskaya. Consequently political jesters have solemnly announced that "the Politbureau of the Communist Party has decided to depose Comrade Krupskaya from her position as Lenin's widow because of activities injurious to the party."

POSTMARK ADVERTISING IS HALTED BY PROTESTS

British Chancellor Revises His Plan to Raise Revenue by Sale of Cancellation Slogans

CLOSE upon the public outcry in Britain against the Government's use of stamp-canceling machinery that is made in America has come the more effective protest against utilizing the postmark to boost private British enterprise. Chancellor Churchill hoped to gain $1,000,000 a year for his budget by selling advertising, as some loyal subjects put it, "over His Majesty's face."

While this idea was adopted from the United States, Chancellor Churchill went further than Uncle Sam. It is one thing to follow the American example with abstract patriotic slogans postmarked for the public benefit. Chancellor Churchill was not content with saying "Go to Wembley," when he first utilized the idea for boosting the British Empire Exhibition, and recently followed it up with "Buy British Goods."

Again, it is another thing to use the national postmark for individual advertising. The United States, it is pointed out, has never dishonored the Father of His Country or the faces of the successive Presidents with slogans like "Buy Jones's Sausages." Besides, what would the 320,000,000 Hindus and Moslems in India, to say nothing of a million in other parts of the Orient and Africa, say when the face of King George V., Emperor of India, is postmarked to advertise products of the abhorrent flesh of the swine?

Then again, while the Mohammedans might welcome some enterprising British packer's advertisement of "The Roast Beef of old England" from an epicurean and patriotic point of view, how about the vegetarian Hindu?

Chancellor Churchill's Economy act endowed his Postmaster General with powers of discretion, but these powers might have led to unfair discrimination. The clause reads: "It is hereby declared that the marks to be used by the Postmaster General for the purpose of canceling stamps used for the payment of the postage chargeable on postal packets may consist of such words or devices as the Postmaster General may in his discretion think proper, including words or devices constituting advertisements in respect of the use of which as postmarks payment is made by any persons to the Postmaster General."

The big London stores took a business instead of a patriotic line. They saw their catalogues and circulars being delivered to customers with postmarks advertising the wares of a rival. To their objections the Postmaster General replied with the business adage of "Fifty-fifty." But trades and business soon obtained the support of the advertising agencies and finally the British Chambers of Commerce got into action.

Meanwhile the public, loyal and ingenious, prepared to defeat Chancellor Churchill's scheme with a black envelope for its letters. One was devised bearing a white space for the address and only space enough on its sable surface for the stamp.

PLAYTHINGS

The sun is in everything, said the famous French scientist, Camille Flammarion, shortly before his death. "We are blind playthings of nature's forces, while nature, in turn, is but a plaything of the sun's formidable power."

MOSES CALLED ON AS A PRECEDE

MOSES in the [illegible] served as an effective [illegible] edent in a criminal [illegible] Serajevo, in which a young Mohammedan woman was accused of [illegible] doning her infant and exposing it [illegible] whatever fate might befall it. As she was penniless, the Court assigned a lawyer to defend her. After the public prosecutor had moved for her conviction and sentence, the lawyer made a counter-motion for her acquittal. The Judge was astonished, as there was no doubt of the facts in the case, and asked him if he was in earnest.

"Certainly."

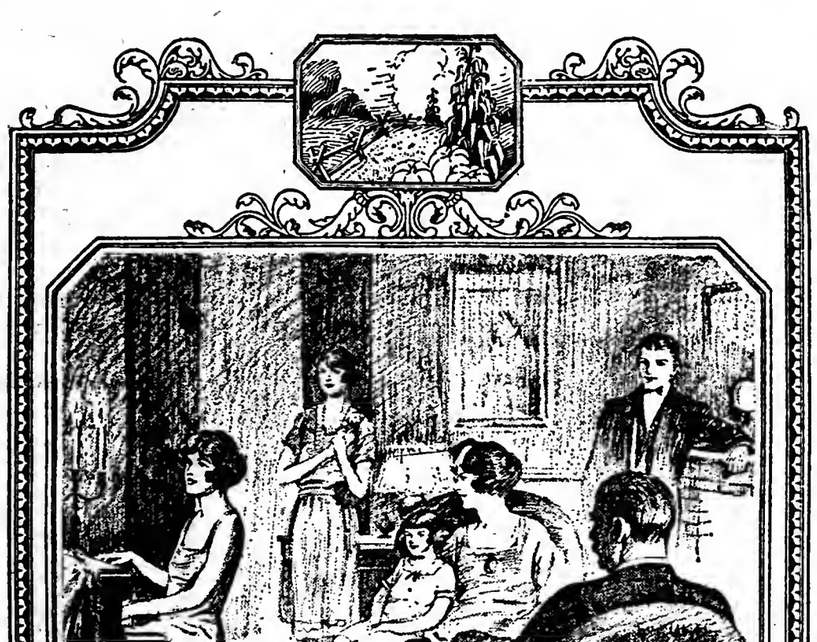
"On what grounds?"

Drawing a Bible from his pocket the advocate asked if the Court believed in the book.

"Assuredly."

"Then," said the advocate, "I appeal to this book, for a precedent, not only for the acquittal but for the rewarding of this unhappy woman."

After reflection, the Court allowed the motion for acquittal is granted, and the child prosper, as did his predecessor in Egypt."



Thanksgiving!

GLORIFY IT WITH MUSIC

THERE is something elemental in the soul's responsiveness to music. Music unlocks the store-house of memory, throws wide the door to noble thoughts and aspirations, shuts out the noise and clamor of an every-day world.

Yours is the vision of an old-world master as your fingers rest upon the keys, to repeat after him the notes he wrote upon the wall.

The characters of days gone by come back to dwell beside you as you sit beneath a shaded lamp or in the soft glow of firelight, listening to the music of an old-time song, a favored aria or sweet refrain. The scenes of childhood; the old homestead; mother when you said good-bye; the romance that was shattered; the courtship of your wife—memory marshalls all before you as the music soothes your soul.

Through music the soul seeks, and finds, expression; through music let grateful hearts give thanks to a kind Providence—thanks for the bountiful gifts of nature in this land of plenty, thanks that we are at peace without and within and thanks that, day by day, the world looks brighter through eyes that see clearer man's duty to man.

CAN it be that yours is a home that does not enjoy the blessing of a fine piano? Then let us correct this condition before Thanksgiving arrives. Let us make it your most memorable holiday, with a new and beautiful piano in the center of the family circle on the most appropriate day of the year.

Come to our warerooms as soon as possible, where you will be delighted, if not actually thrilled, by so remarkable an assemblage of famous-make grands, reproducing grands, uprights and player pianos. Here you will see the greatest gathering of fine pianos under one roof, in the entire East. Here you will enjoy selecting your piano under such happy circumstances, filled with the thought that this Thanksgiving shall not pass without music in your home.

"Let us be known by the quality of the pianos we sell"

PRINCETON CLINCHES BIG THREE LAURELS; BEATS YALE, 10 TO 7

55,000 See Tigers Crown Withdrawal From Triumvirate With Smashing Triumph.

GOAL BY BARUCH DECIDES

Star Also Paves the Way for a Touchdown With Series of Brilliant Forwards.

ELIS WAGE BITTER BATTLE

Twice Have Victory in Sight After Goodwine Crosses Line, but Final Punch Fails.

By JAMES R. HARRISON.

Special to The New York Times.

PRINCETON, N. J., Nov. 13.—The [illegible] and obsequies were held over the departed Big Three this afternoon when Princeton beat Yale and won the football championship of the trinity by a score of 10 to 7 before 55,000.

On the agile and gifted foot of Earl Baruch, sophomore halfback, of 20 years Summers, the Tigers rode to their second Big Three title in two years.

If anybody was the hero of the game, it was Earl Baruch. He threw the ball like Grover Cleveland Alexander pitching strikes over the heart of the plate. He ran with the ball and kicked it a huge distances and tossed the pass which Danny Caulkins caught for the first Princetown touchdown in the second period.

But the sophomore halfback did even a little bit more than that. In the same second period, when both teams scored all their points, he retreated to the 27-yard line and propelled over the cross-bar as artistic a drop kick as ever left the toe of a kicker.

These three points were all that separated Princeton from a Yale eleven which fought gloriously and lost nobly. More important than that, these three points gave Princeton the Big Three title in perpetuity, as the lawyers would say—granting, of course, that Harvard and Princeton do not resume diplomatic relations at some future time.

Tigers Have the Final Word.

The Big Three is gone but not forgotten, and Princeton has the consolation of knowing that it was the last champion of the classic trio. Actions speak louder than words. The communiqués of the Tigers to Cambridge this week were hot enough, but they were not as hot as the galloping gait of a back field which knew no stopping.

Princeton spoke its last word this afternoon when it strolled away with the permanent championship of the impermanent Big Three. Although Yale was the team in hostile uniforms, Princeton addressed its attack to Harvard. Every line jab, every forward pass was intended for local consumption at Cambridge. This was Princeton's parting thrust at the Crimson host.

The Tigers won, but no team was ever nearer defeat. Indeed, in the second and third periods it looked as if the onrush of the Eli horde would sweep the Tigers out of the stadium. On two occasions the wearers of the Blue had the ball within the 10-yard line on the first down, but could not break through Princeton's line.

In the first period the Tigers indulged in an indiscreet fumble and a Yale man pounced on the ball only a short jump from the goal line. Again in the third period a 25-yard run by Phil Bunnell put the pigskin on Princeton's 4-yard line, with only three points to tie.

No football team ever had victory more firmly in its grasp, and no football team ever made less use of its golden opportunities. Twice Yale was only a step away from triumph and possibly the Big Three title, only to see Princeton rise up in its wrath and smear the offensive for heavy losses.

Slagle on the Sidelines.

There was no stopping the Tigers today. Not even the absence of Jakie Slagle, the eminent geologist, could daunt them. Slagle did not play one minute of the game. Sitting on the sidelines, huddled in a big blanket, he wrote finis to his football career at Princeton, while Baruch, his understudy, galloped up and down the field and threw passes that left Yale shaken and bewildered.

The unexpected loss of Slagle, who again hurt his leg in the Harvard game last Saturday, hurt Princeton and cheered up Yale. Another source of comfort for the Elis was the return of Noble and Kline, their back field aces, to the scene of battle.

Kline, rushing away as soon as possible after the funeral of his mother, made a dramatic entrance, donned his uniform and started the game. Noble was rushed into the breach after Yale had scored one touchdown in the second period and was on the verge of another. But not even the presence of his back field stalwarts could bolster Tad Jones's offensive. They had been out too long, had missed too many practice sessions to give Jones the back field punch that he needed so badly this afternoon.

With a little more drive, a little smoother work at centre and in the back field, Tad Jones would have won the game and tonight would be hailed again as a miracle worker who had overturned a strong, confident Princeton eleven and brought the Big Three title within Yale's reach. As it is, Jones has to be satisfied with the crumbs of consolation—with the knowledge that his team fought with magnificent spirit and dash, gave its very best and frightened the Tigers within an inch of their lives on three occasions.

The first period was even, but early in the next round a Yale punt was partly blocked and Princeton recovered on the Elis' 37-yard line. From that point the Tigers drove on for a touchdown, Caulkins taking a pass from Baruch to retop three yards for the score.

Later in the same quarter the Tigers went on another cruise and covered

FIELD GOAL BEATS COLUMBIA AT PENN

Paul Scull Boots Over Ball From 45-Yard Line for Only Score of Struggle.

COMES IN FIRST PERIOD

Lions Show Stonewall Defense When Goal Line Is Threatened —35,000 Witness Game.

By BRYAN FIELD.

Special to The New York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 13.—Paul Scull's field goal on Franklin Field here today again deferred Columbia University's capture of two major victories in one season. Standing on the 45-yard line, the Pennsylvania halfback booted a drop kick over the cross-bar and gave his team a 3 to 0 victory over Columbia.

Coming late in the first quarter, it proved to be the winning margin in a game that was filled with hard football but devoid of thrills. A crowd of 35,000 saw the sixteenth meeting between the two colleges and Penn's victory was its twelfth.

Scull's kick was the result of a Penn march from its own 26-yard line. The hidden ball formations, Wascolonis's line plunging and Rogers's off-tackle shoots brought the ball to the Columbia 36-yard line to give Scull his chance. He took plenty of time and made the goal.

Columbia Defense Strong.

In defeating Columbia today Pennsylvania showed an attack that threatened four times only to be balked by a tenacious Columbia line. The feature of Columbia's play was its defensive strength. It stopped all of the Penn advances and gave the Red and Blue little chance for anything else than field goals. After tucking away the three-point margin in the first period, Penn went out after touchdowns and, as a result lost the ball on downs when around the 25-yard marker.

Pennsylvania could not penetrate the Columbia line and neither could Columbia dent the Pennsylvania forward wall. Penn made only eight first downs and Columbia five, but Columbia had no drop kicker like Scull to fill in when the backs were stopped in their marches. Moreover, Columbia had no punter like Rogers to get the ball down the field and out of danger when the hammering at the line went for nothing.

Lions Miss Their Chance.

On only one occasion did Columbia reach the Pennsylvania 25-yard line. That time fine line plunging by Madden and a 15-yard penalty gave the Blue and White two consecutive first downs and the ball on the Penn 35-yard line. It came late in the fourth quarter and Madden and Sesit tried valiantly to make the 10 yards necessary, but they failed by half a yard and Columbia never got another chance.

Penn's hidden ball formation did not bother Columbia after the first quarter, but Rogers's open-field running and punting gave enough trouble. Wascolonis, the big Penn fullback, gained consistently. These Penn advances were stopped before they got into the Columbia danger zone.

Columbia rarely tried more than two plays when in possession of the ball, whereas Penn always took its three plays and sometimes tempted fate by trying four. On several occasions Penn

FORDHAM IS VICTOR ON FORWARD PASS

Throw to Leary in Last 4 Minutes After 80-Yard Advance Puts Maroon on Top.

HALPERN BOOTS FIELD GOAL

Puts C. C. N. Y. Ahead in First Quarter of Closely Contested Football Game.

Marching down the field 80 yards to score on a forward pass from DeLany to Captain Tom Leary, Fordham came back in the last four minutes to defeat City College, 7 to 3, in the annual football game between the two metropolitan rivals, held yesterday in the Lewisohn Stadium.

Thus ended one the most bitter struggles ever seen in the stadium a game which was filled with action from start to finish, which saw attacks and counter-attacks, spectacular runs and thrilling forward passes which had the 5,000 spectators always in suspense.

City College played as though inspired and, although defeated, gave a fine exhibition of fight and grit. Fordham was an overwhelming favorite to win and so sure was Coach Gargan of the contest that he started his second team, with the intention of saving his regulars for the Georgetown contest next week. But he and nobody else, says perhaps Coach Parker, was prepared for the terrific attack which the Lavender launched, which kept the ball in Maroon territory almost the entire first half and scored three points in the opening period before the game was many minutes old.

Sends in First Team.

With his reserves being tossed about, Coach Gargan was compelled to stave off the onslaught by injecting his entire first team at the start of the second period. But even the first eleven found the afternoon anything but tame and were fighting to prevent a Lavender touchdown as the whistle blew ending the first half.

Both teams were penalized on several occasions for unnecessary roughness. C. C. N. Y., emulating Brown's iron men, used only thirteen men, the last Tubridy, breaking into action for only a brief two minutes, when Captain Tige Seidler, playing his last game for the Lavender, was hurt running back the Maroon kickoff.

Fordham met a forward wall which was entirely too strong for it. The Lavender line, which has played well all season, never reached the heights that it did yesterday and pushed past the Maroon wall to spill Graham and the other Fordham backs before they ever got started. Offensively the Lavender forward wall looked very good and wide gaps were made by Dreiband. Willie Halpern and Johnny Clarke to permit the City College backs to plunge through. Bonstein bore the brunt of the Lavender plunges and fairly tore apart the Maroon forward wall.

Fordham, with its back to the wall finding that it could get nothing through the line, resorted to a brilliant overhead game, which bewildered the Lavender team. In the final half the Maroon succeeded in completing eleven out of seventeen passes.

With Zev Graham so closely watched that never in the game could he break away for one of his famed runs, Jim DeLany jumped into the breach and it was to him more than any other Fordham player that the Lavender can attribute its defeat. DeLany tossed long forwards and little flips over the centre of the line which fairly had the Lavender defense dizzy, and it was this same player who broke away for many of the long runs that the Maroon accounted for. Graham never got started time and again being thrown behind his line for a loss. Zakszewski showed to advantage with his defensive play and his ability at receiving passes.

It was Willie Halpern, who besides

LOUISIANA VICTOR, 3 TO 0.

Beats Mississippi by Staving Off Last Desperate Attack.

Special to The New York Times.

BATON ROUGE, La., Nov. 13.—Guy Neasom drew only a passing cheer from the confident Louisiana stand as he dropped back and kicked a field goal from the 30-yard line early in the second quarter this afternoon at the University of Mississippi stadium, yet when the final pistol popped, the Bengals held only a 3 to 0 lead over the University of Mississippi.

"Tadpole" Smith, brilliant Mississippi half back, clipped off several first downs on end runs in the final minutes of play and brought the ball to Louisiana's 1-yard line. There the Tigers held for downs.

The line-up:

LOUISIANA (3).		MISSISSIPPI (0).

ROCHESTER VICTOR, 47 TO 6.

Beats Rensselaer Tech at Troy in Slow Contest.

Special to The New York Times.

TROY, N. Y., Nov. 13.—The Rochester University eleven, smashing through the Rensselaer Tech line, around it and over it, for repeated gains of from 20 to 40 yards, won a slow, one-sided game here today, 47 to 6. Wilson, for the victors, made a 90-yard run to a touchdown. Captain Shannon starred.

Anderson's kicking and Daday's runs shone for the losers.

54,000 SEE HARVARD LOSE TO BROWN, 21-0

Touchdowns on Forward Passes in First and Second Periods Settle Issue Quickly.

BRUINS STILL UNDEFEATED

"Iron Men" Withdraw in Final Quarter and Subs Add Score —Crimson Fights Vainly.

Special to The New York Times.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Nov. 13.—Brown University's football team has yet to meet its betters. Coach "Tuss" McLaughry's eleven marched on toward supremacy this afternoon at Soldiers Field before a crowd of 54,000, which packed the stadium to its portals, and defeated Harvard, 21 to 0.

The predicted reaction from the Princeton game failed to materialize for Harvard, while the undefeated eleven from Providence forward-passed its way to touchdowns in the first and second periods, and added another in the final quarter soon after the Bruin coech had relieved most of his "iron men" with subetitutes. Harvard fought desperately. It was able to stop Brown's running attack after a fashion, but it was bewildered when the victors took to the air.

Brown's Ends Shine.

Brown's fine ends, particularly Captain Hal Broda, the rigidity of the rest of the line, and the spectacular work of Roy Randall and Dave Mishel in the back field were responsible in the main for hauling down the Crimson. The victory was the Brunonians' fifth in their football contests with Harvard. The Crimson has won twenty-six.

Mishel did all of Brown's passing, while Randall was on the receiving end of many that helped to carry the Rhode Island machine to another triumph. Broda continually broke through and nailed Harvard's potential forward passers for great losses. The first two Brown touchdowns resulted directly from aerials thrown by Mishel to Randall.

At times, Coach Hoween's eleven found itself. It started auspiciously, completing two passes on the first playe after the opening kickoff, to bring the ball well into Brown's territory. But the Crimaon lacked consistency. Brown was able consistently to shatter the Harvard attack when it pressed towerd the touchdown zone.

Hervard was without the ecrvices of Clem Coady, its star tackle and captain for most of the game. He entered for a short time only in the third period, when it seemed as though the Crimson were on its way to a touchdown. The inconeistency of French made Coady's loss as a kicker felt at first, but this loss was forgotten when Henry Chauncey took French's place. Chauncey outbooted Randall in most of the punting duels which occupied the second half.

Harvard Threatens First.

In the first period, after receiving the opening kick-off on its 40-yard line, Harvard immediately took to the air. French's pass to Saltonstall put the ball on the Brown 39-yard line. French threw another to Putnam for a gain of 8 yards, but here the attack stopped. Brown took the ball on downs. Randall kicked far out of danger after two running plays, putting the ball on the Crimson 26-yard line. An exchange of kicks and a 15-yard penalty for each team found Brown with the ball. The Bruins recovered their loss on the penalty on pass, Mishel to Randall, for 24 yards. Lawrence made the first down.

Mishel broke into a clear field for a gain of 30 yards. Several running plays put the ball on Harvard's 9-yard line. Mishel then threw a pass to Randall, who evaded Al Miller and crossed

CRUSADER IS BEATEN IN HIS LAST RACE

Champion Ends Career Under Silks in Honorable Defeat by Edith Cavell.

BATTLE OF MAN O' WARS

Colt of Great Sire Loses to Filly in Pimlico Cup as the Meeting Ends.

By HENRY R. ILSLEY.

Special to The New York Times.

PIMLICO, Nov. 13.—Carrying racing colors for the last time in his short and brilliant career, Crusader went down to honorable defeat in the seventh running of the famous Pimlico Cup Handicap at the course of the Maryland Jockey Club here this afternoon. The great son of Man o' War and Star Fancy, champion three-year-old of the year, was forced to bow to Edith Cavell, a daughter of Man o' War.

Weight told the story over the trying course of two miles and a quarter and Crusader was unable to give thirty-three pounds and a beating to the sterling filly, stopping in the stretch drive and being defeated by three lengths.

Sande rode a well judged race on Crusader and on the turn for home was able to bring his mount up to challenge the filly. Crusader's nose crept up to her saddle girths, but that was the nearest he ever came to gaining the lead. Bourassa rode a hard finish and when the weight began to exact its toll, Edith Cavell drew away again and won easily.

It was no hollow victory that Edith Cavell gained over the femous three-year-old, for Crussder forced her to run to a new track record of 3:52 1-5. The former record of 3:53 flat was made in this same Pimlico Cup by Exterminator when he won in 1920.

Winner the Lightweight.

The filly was the lightweight of the four that faced the barrier at the head of the stretch for the start of the long journey, carrying only ninety-three pounds, while Crusader packed his scale weight of 126 pounds. The victory was worth $8,325 to Walter M. Jeffords, who bred and owns the filly. Scott Harlan saddled her and sent her forth for the greatest effort of her racing career.

The great event of the closing day of the meeting was run beneath leaden skies and before a gathering that taxed the facilities of the course. The clubhouse was filled to capacity all afternoon, while not a vacant seat could be found in the great grandstand. Aisles were packed, thousands jammed the lawns, while many journeyed to the infield for each race.

Edward F. Whitney declined the issue in the cup contest with Joy Smoke and Mr. Jeffords scratched Mars in favor of the filly. Opposed to her and the champion were the Audley Farm's Princess Doreen and The Clown. Trainer Henderson sending the Princess right back after her defeat by Mars yesterday.

Crusader headed the parade to the post and never appeared in finer fettle. There was no delay at the post and Starter James Milton dispatched the four well aligned. Bourassa sent Edith Cavell into the lead with the snap of the barrier and from that moment she was never really near defeat. In the run down the homestretch the first time she opend a commanding lead, and the only time she was threatened was when Crusader made his futile challenge a quarter of a mile from home.

Sande Takes a Hold.

Crusader broke right with the filly, but Sande took a strong hold on him and he trailed the field to the clubhouse turn and around it to the backstretch. Then Sande let out one wrap

NOTRE DAME BEATS ARMY AS FLANAGAN GALLOPS 63 YARDS

72,000 at the Stadium See Voedisch Clear Way for Fleet Back in Second Half.

INTERFERENCE FORMS WELL

Star Cuts Through Tackle and Then Down Field—Final Score Is 7 to 0.

TEAMS EVENLY MATCHED

Victors Make Nine First Downs to Seven for Rivals—Westerners Keep the Famed Wilson in Check.

By ALLISON DANZIG.

It is an axiom of war that victory lies on the side with the stronger reserves, and so Notre Dame, with two sets of backs, one the equal of the other, and Chris Flanagan as its ace in the hole, brought the winning streak of Army to an end yesterday at the Yankee Stadium.

Making his début early in the second period with a 12-yard run around the end the very first time he carried the ball, Flanagan earned a place for himself among the most sterling steppers in football as he cut loose through Army's right tackle, took to the side line and, screened perfectly by his interference, ran 63 yards for a touchdown.

That touchdown and the extra point following, made by O'Boyle, constituted the only scoring of one of the most savagely and evenly fought games played in the thirteen years' history of the rivalry between the two teams. The final count of 7-0 was a fair index of the relative merits of the elevens, both of which brought power to bear on the attack that would have been far more fruitful in points had it not been directed against two marauding lines that tackled with Berserk fury and that could become adamant when the play was deep in their territory.

Stirring Spectacle Presented.

These annual struggles between Notre Dame and Army—the one bringing to the occasion the breeziness and daring of the Rockne developments in the attack, the other typifying the rugged solidity of the nation's bulwark and supplying its share of the glamour with the parade of its cadet corps—are looked forward to each season as among the most stirring spectacles of the year of sports.

Seventy-two thousand spectators filled the stadium to its last seat for yesterday's renewal of the classic, one of the greatest gatherings that has seen a football game in New York.

The thirteenth game of the series was characteristic. From the time the spruce, gray-uistered cadets marched into the stadium to the martial strains of their band until the last gun had been fired, marking the end of the game, there was always something to rivet the spectator's attention, make him tingle with excitement and rejoice that the was there.

Stirring music, officers of all ranks, captivating girls in their furs and colors and ideal weather set the stage for this struggle between the highest rated team of the Middle West and one of the best of the East.

And what a struggle it was, worthy in every way of its setting and the size of the crowd. There have been more spectacularly played games than was this one, but never one in which raw physical courage was put to a sterner test as the two lines stood up to the battering of pile-driving backs.

Teams Evenly Matched.

Because the two teams were so evenly matched it may have seemed to some that neither eleven was anything to brag about, but beauty does not act as a foil to beauty. Put an all-American player against another all-American and neither of them will stand out.

How evenly these two grim fighting outfits were matched is indicated by the first downs, of which Notre Dame made nine and Army seven, each team registering four in the opening quarter. Notre Dame made 207 yards by rushing, to 127 by Army, but 63 of the 80 yards differencs were accounted for by the run of Flanagan.

That run of 63 yards and his other of 12 were the only substantial gains made by this flashy back in spite of the fact that he is rated among the speediest and most elusive runners in the game, North, South, East or West.

Harry Wilson, who had something of a field day in that 27-0 victory of Army over a green Notre Dame team last year, was smothered. Only once during the entire game did this brilliant carrier ever get loose. Running the ends he found suicidal, and when he sought to cut back he found himself bedged in a trap. Wilson didn't have a chance to look like an all-American yesterday against that Notre Dame forward wall and the lightning work of the Notre Dame backs, who came in like a abot to nail him behind the lines with magnificent tackles.

It was Murrell who was the big ace in the Army back field yesterday—Murrell, the find of the year at West Point, who learned his football at Minnesota. It was Murrell who lifted the Cadets out of their seats in the first quarter with his 28-yard run through tackle, who nailed the Notre Dame backs as they sought to turn an end, who knocked down passes, who did the kicking and who, almost single handed, earned two first downs for the Army at the very outset of the game.

O'Boyle a Great Plunger.

And just as Murrell stood out on Biff Jones's team, so did O'Boyle, until Flanagan came on the scene, throwing the Notre Dame cheering section into a frenzy. Running low to the ground with the speed of a bullet, O'Boyle hit that Army line so hard that even an irresistible body would have had to yield. There were times in the first

STRONG KICKS PLACEMENT

Connor Carries Ball Over for Only Touchdown—N. Y. U. Menaced at the End.

ONE 37-YARD RUN WASTED

Close of Southerners Makes Dash, but Teammates Are in Motion Too Soon.

New York University closed its home football season at Ohio Field yesterday by defeating a strong Davis and Elkins team, 10 to 0. The Violet outfit jumped into the lead in the first quarter with Strong's goal from placement but the Southerners were a threat throughout and the game was not bagged until Jack Connor crossed the line for the lone touchdown late in the final period.

Thirteen thousand persons saw Coach Chick Meehan's squad score its eighth consecutive victory, thus remaining one of the few undefeated teams in the East. But the game might have had an entirely different aspect had the stockingless Southerners been able to avoid careless errors such as being in motion while the ball was being passed and becoming repeatedly offside. New York also came in for its share of penalties and the game was somewhat slowed up by this fact.

Tactics Are Similar.

Sweeping end runs, long and short forward passes, intermingled occasionally with off-tackle plays and line bucks, was the system used by each team. New York's passing attack reached some degree of success, but Davis and Elkins also showed ability in this department.

It was mostly by spectacular plays that each team made its worthwhile gains. An intercepted pass or a sturdy defense when in the vicinity of its own goal checked many an enemy attack, but in the final minutes of play Davis and Elkins had the Violets on the run as a result of a terrific attack started on its own 40-yard line, and the game ended with the Southerners in possession of the ball 5 yards away from New York's goal line.

In the second minute of play, Close got away on a 37-yard run to New York's 10-yard mark, but this team was in motion while the ball was being snapped and the play did not count. Three consecutive incompleted passes and Ellis was forced to punt to Roberts, who ran the ball back to midfield. Three end runs resulted in a gain of 15 yards and Strong was unsuccessful on his attempted placement kick from the 40-yard line.

Offside Prevents Score.

A bullet-like pass, Bowles to Warren, brought the ball to the N. Y. U. 47-yard line, but Connor intercepted a pass on his 43-yard line and followed this by throwing five out of six successful passes to Briante, Riordan and Strong. Connor delayed too long on the next play but he managed to pass to Loss, who canght the ball over the goal line. The play did not count, as N. Y. U. was offside. On the very next play, Strong went back to the 30-yard line and kicked a goal from placement.

After the next kick-off, Bowles passed to Ellis, who kept right on going through New York's secondary defense for a touchdown after a 70-yard sprint. It so happened that Ellis stepped outside by a margin of a few inches on the 20-yard line and the touchdown did not count.

As in the past few games, New York lacked the punch to put the ball over when near its goal, and Davis and Elkins held for downs from within its 6-yard line. A lapse of the Southerners' defense against passing resulted in Loss making first down on Davis and Elkins' 10-yard line on a long pass from Connor.

While the West Virginians were organizing a defense against passing, Connor hit the line for a 4-yard gain and crossed the line on a play through right guard on the next play. Strong kicked the goal from placement.

PITT AND W. AND J. IN SCORELESS DRAW

Rivals, in Twenty-seventh Tilt, Unable to Score Before Crowd of 45,000.

PANTHER LACKS A PUNCH

Gets Nine First Downs to Six by Presidents, but Fails to Keep Pace When Threatening.

Special to The New York Times.

PITTSBURGH, Nov. 13.—The University of Pittsburgh and Washington and Jefferson, ancient gridiron rivals, battled to a scoreless tie before 45,000 spectators in the Pitt Stadium here today. The result was an upset, as the Presidents were conceded to have the advantage.

It was a hard-fought contest, with most of the playing done in the W. and J. territory, but neither team could sustain any consistent advance. Pitt negotiated nine first downs to the Presidents' six.

Cook, Red and Black halfback, made the only two spectacular plays of the day, getting 38 yards on a douhla pass in the first period and 26 yards on an end run near the close of the game.

Pittsburgh showed a powerful attack with a close formation, but the Panther was unable to keep its pace. Twice Pitt was within scoring distance but lacked the punch.

Carlin Fumbles Kick.

Once in front of the goal posts, the Gold and Blue, failed to negotiate the required distance on a forward pass. Pittsburgh had taken the ball on ' . and J. 9-yard line when Carlin fumbled a kick and Kern fell on the ball, but this break availed nothing.

Later in the game Pitt had the ball on W. and J. 15-yard line, but the field goal try failed .

W. and J. was minus the services of Heisel, halfback, and Amos was forced to retire on account of injuries. The work of Cook and Kirkman, however, offset these losses.

W. and J. Resorts to Kicks.

W. and J. resorted to kicking. Frequently they kicked on third downs and these kicks brought yardage. The Pitt line, although lighter than that of W. and J., proved equal to the task imposed upon it.

It was the twenty-seventh meeting of the contenders and each team has thirteen victories to its credit.

Overomee Clarkson on Canton Field, Muddy From Snowfall.

Special to The New York Times.

CANTON, N. Y., Nov. 13.—Playing on a muddy field, after a two-inch fall of snow, St. Lawrence University defeated Clarkson College 3 to 0 here this afternoon. The score came early in the second quarter. St. Lawrence completed a 10-yard pass, bringing the ball on the Clarkson 25-yard line. Three line bucks failed and a placement kick was tried. The ball hit the line and St. Lawrence recovered. Another placement was tried and made good from the 16-yard line.

PENN STATE VICTOR OVER BUCKNELL, 9-0

Roepke Scores 34-Yard Field Goal and Paves Way for Touchdown by Long Run.

LIONS GET 12 FIRST DOWNS

Hold Bisons to Two Before Crowd of 15,000—Pritchard Goes Over in Second Period.

Special to The New York Times.

STATE COLLEGE, Pa., Nov. 13.—A touchdown and a field goal, the latter by Roepke and the former due mainly to his efforts, brought Penn State a 9-to-0 victory over Bucknell here today in the annual Pennsylvania Day game. A colorful crowd of 15,000, including many Bucknell rooters and hosts of house-party girls, witnessed the hard-earned triumph of the Lions over a strong defensive Bucknell team.

A 30-yard run by Johnny Roepke, Penn State back, led to the touchdown in the second period. Pritchard scoring on a plunge through right guard. In the third quarter it was Roepke again, as the triple threat of the Lion back field, who booted a placement goal from the 34-yard line.

There was no denying Penn State's superiority. The Lions registered twelve first downs to two for the Bisons. Wally Diehl netted one for the visitors in the final quarter on two off-tackle thrusts, while McCleary made the other early in the game on a 22-yard dash around end.

Except for these occasions, Bucknell was powerless against the Penn State defense and was never closer than the Lion 30-yard mark. Only once did they get that far, for most of the play was in Bucknell territory.

WISE BRILLIANT LEADER

Captain of Worcester Eleven Shines on Offensive — Losers' Forwards Effective in Drive for Touchdown.

Special to The New York Times.

WORCESTER, Mass., Nov. 13.—Holy Cross scored its sixth victory of the season by defeating Catholic University here this afternoon, 14 to 6.

The visitors got the jump in the opening minutes of play and with three well-executed forward passes got into the lead, with Foley making a touchdown but failing at the goal.

In the second period Wise got away for a 35-yard run on Foley's punt, and with two short forwards the ball was on Catholic University's 9-yard line in two smashes. At the centre of the line Daly dove over for a touchdown. Wise added the point. The third period found both teams fighting stubbornly and watching for a break.

In the closing minutes of the final quarter the Purple attack got moving, with Wise opening up with his air attack, which finally put over the final touchdown for Holy Cross. Wise brought the total to 14 hy his goal.

MISSOURI CRUSHES WASHINGTON, 45-6

Game at St. Louis Ends With Fist Fight on Field Among the Players and Fans.

Special to The New York Times.

ST. LOUIS, Mo., Nov. 13.—Missouri University routed Washington University here today hy a score of 45 to 6. Washington got off with a rush and, with the assistance of a 60-yard run by Hays on the second play after the kick-off, pushed over a touchdown. Whittier missed the extra point.

The Tigers then began their march that did not abate until the final play. They scored in every quarter of the game, using a diversified attack before which Washington was helpless. Four of the Tigers' touchdowns came on forward passes. Bacchus scooped up a fumble and raced 50 yards for another. Tuttle twice plowed through the line for scores.

The game closed with a fist fight, in which fans and players mixed as the Washington team left the field. Collins of Washington was ejected for slugging and the team was penalized half the distance of the field.

CAREY'S KICK BRINGS VICTORY TO ITHACANS

25,000 Watch Cornell Score 17 Points in Final Period to Triumph by 24 to 23.

DOOLEY HERO AND VILLAIN

Dartmouth Star Runs Wild for Most of Game, but Missed Goal Spells Defeat.

HE BOOTS ONE FROM FIELD

Cornell So Delirious After Rally It Tears Up Own Goal Posts, Carries Team in Triumph.

Special to The New York Times.

ITHACA, N. Y., Nov. 13.—Emerson Carey of Hutchinson, Kan., has kicked many a placement goal in his football days but never in his brilliant career has the lad's calm poise, keen eye, and skillful boot accomplished so much for his alma mater as today. Carey turned defeat for Cornell into victory over Dartmouth, 24 to 23, in as thrilling a game as Schoellkopf Field has ever seen.

Beaten for three periods, Cornell found herself for the first time this year as the official watch was ticking away the precious minutes of the final quarter. From the short end of a 23-to-7 score the Ithacans battered their way to victory by a smashing, rushing attack, some unexpectedly brilliant passes and Carey's kick.

They did not take the game without a fight. In the fading light of a perfect November afternoon a gallant Dartmouth team rallied desperately. It had spent itself in achieving what ordinarily would have meant victory. It rallied on its nerve. Still victors, with only minutes to go, the big Green warriors stopped Cornell 3 yards short of a first down on Dartmouth's 8-yard line. The score was then 23 to 21, Dartmouth leading.

The Critical Kick.

The Stadium was hushed. It had yelled and rioted with cheers as Cornell had performed the seemingly impossible feat of rolling up 14 points in the final period, to get within striking distance of victory. Now was the climax—and 25,000 spectators were silent.

Carey leisurely walked back from the line of scrimmage and with Balderston, who was about to hold the ball for him, carefully cleared the ground for his effort. The Dartmouth team, all on line, crouched ready to spring. With victory in the balance Rapuano shot a perfect pass to Balderston, who poised the ball neatly. Carey's strong right leg lifted it squarely and truly across the goal posts and all Cornellians went mad.

An inconsequential play or two and the game was over. Then thousands of Cornell students and alumni poured down upon the field, lifted Carey and his team-mates to their shoulders, and the snake dance started from one end of the gridiron to the other. First the south goal posts were uprooted, then the north, and there was none to say the Cornellians no.

It was a unique experience in Cornell history—the first time that the goal posts had ever been uprooted. It probably was the first time anywhere that goal posts were uprooted by the partisans of the winning home team.

Dooley Hero and Villain.

Oddly enough, Dartmouth, which has lived by the pass, was overcome by the pass. Strangely enough, Eddie Dooley, who had strutted the stage in his final game as a conqueror, and who for over two periods had shown all of his stuff to an admiring though dismayed audience, played the villain's as well as the hero's part in this piece. He missed an easy goal after touchdown in the third period. If he had kicked it, the game would have ended in a tie. He also threw a forward pass deep in his own territory in the fourth period, which Hoekelman intercepted on Dartmouth's 32-yard line.

This gave the Ithacans a strategic chance. They made it good. They struck with rushes and a pass, and they tasted blood. But Dooley had been throwing passes much of the afternoon and Cornell had never been able to block them. So his daring was justified. That touchdown, however, was all that was needed to turn what had been just a football team into eleven supermen. After that Cornell scored another touchdown and Carey kicked them to victory.

The game began auspiciously for Dartmouth when Holleran blocked Balderston's punt and recovered it on the Ithacans' 30-yard line. A short pass to Cole made 15 yards, and then Lane dodged his way around Cornell's right side for a touchdown.

Red Team Fights Back.

The Red team came right back, however, and from midfield went down for a touchdown on a 20-yard run by Butterfield, a 30-yard pass, Isaly to Gassner, and a tackle smash by Butterfield, which scored.

Dooley's perfect punting—he dropped three inside of the 5-yard line from midfield during this dramatic battle—and his passes to Cole and Picken, the brilliant rushing of Lane, MacPhail and especially Black, overwhelmed the Ithacans during the second period. If ever a team looked beaten that team was Cornell. Early in the second period Dooley kicked an easy drop kick from the 20-yard line. A little later he threw a splendid pass to Cole, who ran 30 yards for a touchdown. Early in the third period Dooley ran back a punt from Cornell's 45 to Cornell's 15 yard line and a pass to Lane produced another touchdown.

Dartmouth led, 23 to 7. Attacking again, only Lane's muff of a pass over the goal line prevented another Dartmouth score.

Then Dobie sent Beck, Molinet and Hoekelman into the back field, and Cornell took on a new lease of life. Balderston punted out of danger. He then intercepted one of Dooley's passes at midfield. Molinet and Hoekelman rushed to the 30-yard line, where Dartmouth braced. A short kick by Balderston went to the 14-yard line, and then Hoekelman intercepted that pass on the 32-yard line. Cornell retaliated with the pass, Beck throwing one to Balderston on the 4-yard line, and on the second play of the fourth period Cornell scored. Molinet went over.

Dartmouth Weakening.

Cornell held Lane to the 15-yard line on the next kick-off. The Red line smeared Dartmouth, which was fast weakening under the Cornell pounding. The Red line was proving its superiority at this stage of the game. Dooley punted to his 45-yard line, and Cornell rushed 25 yards before Dartmouth braced. Dooley again punted to midfield. Cornell rushed 25 yards, and then Hoekelman passed to Balderston, who went to the 1-yard line.

Hoekelman crashed through for the score, and the count was 23 to 21. On the next kick-off Lane was stopped on the 20-yard line. Again Cornell smeared the Green drive. Dooley punted to midfield. Then came a pass that spelled Dartmouth's doom. Balderston threw a long one to Wickham, who was playing brilliantly. He made 33 yards before he was downed. Carey then stepped in with his placement goal, and Cornell had won.

YACHT DINNER THURSDAY.

North American Racing Union May Discuss Measurement Rule.

The annual meeting of the recently formed North American Yacht Racing Union will be held Thursday afternoon at the Yale Club, Forty-fourth Street and Vanderbilt Avenue. Representatives not only of local yacht clubs but those of the Great Lakes and Canada will attend the meeting, which will be presided over by Clifford D. Mallory, President of the union and Vice Commodore of the Indian Harbor Yacht Club.

It is expected that a change in the measurement rule will be discussed at the meeting and a vote may be taken on the question. There is a good deal of sentiment among yachtsmen favorable to adopting the International Rule, which governs yacht racing in England and on the Continent, in place of the Universal Rule under which yachts are built here at present. Following the meeting there will be a dinner at the Yale Club for the members of the union.

The New York and Larchmont Yacht Clubs so far have not joined the new association.

American Association Owners to Confer in Asheville Dec. 5.

CHICAGO, Nov. 13 (AP).—The club owners of the American Association, instead of meeting in Chicago as usual, decided today to hold their annual session at Asheville, N. C., Dec. 5, in connection with the meeting of the National Association of Minor Leagues.

MANHATTAN DOWNS UPSALA BY 20 TO 6

Displays Increased Power on Offense in Last Half After Leading, 7-6, at Mid-Time.

HAYES GOES OVER TWICE

Both Touchdowns Come After Intermission—Jasper Line Strong on Defense.

Special to The New York Times.

EAST ORANGE, N. J., Nov. 13.—Manhattan College defeated Upsala College at Ashland Stadium here today by 20 to 6. The work of the Jasper line, with all its regulars available for the first time since the opening game, featured the work of the victors.

Captain George Smith blocked three kicks and played a great game at end. Manhattan was first to score. A forward pass from C. Cohalan to T. Cohalan netted 33 yards, placing the ball on the 25-yard line. On a fake plunge Louie Mancs skirted right end for 12 yards. Skidd plunged on three successive plays to the 2-yard line, where he fumbled, Johnson recovering for Upsala. Wooley kicked to the 35-yard line, but the Green and White, on a series of line bucks by Sheridan and Skidd, put the ball over.

Just before the whistle closed the first half, Upsala scored. A 30-yard pass from Baker to Law and a pass from the 1-yard line, Wooley to Law, made the score 7-6, the extra point try failing.

In the second half, Skidd's line bucking combined with his 35-yard pass to Mike Hayes netted another Manhattan touchdown. The Jaspers showed added power in the second half.

The last Jasper score came on a series of straight line bucks by C. Smith and Skidd, with Hayes circling right end for his second touchdown.

On a fumbled kick by Cohalan in the last period, Johnson recovered and dashed to the 20-yard line. An 18-yard pass from Baker to Law brought the ball to Manhattan's 2-yard line, where the Green and White withstood four charges against its line.
